In vv. 3–8, Paul urged the Thessalonians to holiness in sexual matters, avoiding all forms of porneia or unlawful sexual immorality (v. 3). The term porneia derives from the Greek term for prostitute and refers to any form of illicit sexual activity. The necessity of making a decisive break from the accepted sexual mores of the Greco-Roman world was an important and needful reminder because Gentile converts often struggled in this area (cf. Acts 15:20; 1 Cor. 5:1; 6:13; 18; Gal. 5:19). In 1 Thessalonians 4:4–5, Paul specified the practical steps that would enable the Thessalonians to avoid sexual immorality. They were to control their skeuos in a sanctified (holy) and honorable way (v. 4). This Greek term skeuos is ambiguous and may refer either to a man's wife (1 Pet. 3:7) or his own body (2 Cor. 4:7). In the first case, Paul exhorted them to take a wife as a means of avoiding sexual sin (see 1 Cor. 6:12–20; 7:2–7). In the second instance, he urged sexual restraint and self-control. Whichever way skeuos is interpreted, the physical act of porneia is identified in 1 Thessalonians 4:5 as originating from an inability to control the passion of lust. The physical act results from internal indiscipline. As a result of knowing God, however, the Thessalonians knew how to control their passions. Ethics flow from theology. In contrast, the Gentiles who did not know God were unable to control their passions (v. 5). The Gentiles were guilty of sexual immorality, a behavior ultimately originating from their idolatrous worship of other gods (Rom. 1:24–27).

Paul provided a number of motives for avoiding porneia. First, in 1 Thessalonians 4:6 he warned that they should not take advantage of each other in this regard. In the ancient world, the offense caused by porneia was primarily viewed as occurring between men (and even then only between those who were social equals). When a man committed adultery, he caused harm to the woman's husband. When he slept with an unmarried girl, he caused harm to her father. Prior to marriage, the woman belonged to her father, and within marriage, to her husband. The implicit offense caused to or by the woman, present in all acts of heterosexual porneia, should be acknowledged. As sexual immorality, porneia also applies to homosexual acts (see Rom. 1:26–29). Porneia was never a private matter for Paul, as it destroys relationships within the Christian community (1 Cor. 6:18–19). It hurts brothers and sisters.

The second motivation to sexual holiness is the strongest sanction Paul could possibly give: that the Lord would punish those who transgress (1 Thess. 4:6). Sexual sin is not a matter of indifference with God (see Lev. 18:6–30). Those who disregard the boundaries God has placed around sexuality and who take advantage of others for the sake of their own lust will face the wrath of God when Jesus returns (cf. Rom. 1:24–27; 1 Cor. 6:9). Paul concluded his exhortation on sexual love with a final reminder that the calling of God is a call to holiness rather than impurity (1 Thess. 4:7). Therefore, those who ignore Paul's exhortation are in fact rejecting God Himself, who gives the Holy Spirit (v. 8). The description of the Spirit as holy means that anyone who commits fornication—identified as a turning away from God's call to holiness—necessarily rejects the Holy Spirit. For Paul, holiness was not restricted to a small and privileged spiritual elite able to retreat to secluded cloisters. Instead, simply by avoiding porneia, the people of God demonstrate holiness in their sexual behavior.

Why did Paul place such a strong emphasis on sexual purity? His exhortation on porneia should be set within the context of the earlier Jerusalem Council, held possibly just one or two years prior to the writing of this letter. At the Council, the early church leaders met to decide whether Gentile believers should be circumcised, the implication being that circumcision represented a commitment to observe all the Jewish law (Acts 15:1–29). While the Council ultimately agreed that Gentiles did not need to be circumcised in order to be genuine Christians, it did note that Gentile believers should abstain from things polluted by idols, from sexual immorality, from the meat of strangled animals, and from blood (Acts 15:20). These stipulations reflect the minimum requirements of the Levitical holiness code for Gentiles living among Israelites. Both Israelites and Gentiles were prohibited from eating meat with blood (Lev. 17:10–16), inappropriate heterosexual and all homosexual relations (Lev. 18:1–30), and idol worship (Lev. 20:1–5). These practices, above all others, limit a person's ability to relate to God. By adopting these requirements, the Jerusalem Council acknowledged that Gentile Christians were required to follow the same legal stipulations required by Jews or Gentile God-fearers who worshiped in the synagogue (see commentary on Acts 15:1–35). Paul's exhortations to sexual holiness demonstrate his willingness to promote a definition of what it means to be part of the people of God in agreement with the Council's decision. Paul was no loose cannon, and he was willing to listen to the voice of the wider church.

In 1 Thessalonians 4:9–12, Paul exhorted the Thessalonians to continually increase in love for each other (philadelphia; v. 9). They could love because they had been taught by God Himself to love (v. 9). The prophet Isaiah predicted that a restored Israel would be taught by the Lord (Is. 54:13). For Paul, this promise had come true in the fledgling community of Thessalonian believers. They had demonstrated love for one another, and Paul was hoping that it would increase. He was, in reality, asking believers from very different social and ethnic backgrounds—many of whom would have been rejected by their families due to their conversion—to treat each other as blood brothers and sisters. God is creating a family for Himself, and as such, believers are to relate to each other as fellow family members.

Paul explained in practical terms his call to love more and more (1 Thess. 4:11–12). The Thessalonians were to philotimeomai ("endeavor") to lead a quiet life (v. 11). This Greek term implies that this was how they might practically demonstrate their love (philia). The expression "the quiet life" had specific connotations in Paul's day. Many Greek philosophical schools reacted against the imperial dominance of Rome by advocating a passive form of political resistance. The Epicureans believed that happiness was possible only if one led a quiet life—a life of withdrawal and retirement from the world—separated from the messiness of public life and political intrigue. This disengagement resulted in sharp criticism from those who sought to make the best of a bad situation. It would have been understandable for Paul to have made a similar call to withdraw, considering the persecution he had experienced at the hands of the Roman authorities (Acts 17:1–9). Instead, his "quiet life" required the Thessalonians to engage socially and economically with society through manual labor (1 Thess. 4:11). Further, they were to mind their own affairs, to be gainfully employed as modeled by Paul himself in order that they relate appropriately to non-Christians (those "outside") in order to win their respect, and to avoid being in need due to lack of industriousness (vv. 11–12). Their love was to be expressed through how they handled their finances. In this manner, they would avoid further conflict with the authorities and demonstrate values approved by nonbelievers.

4:13–18. Exhortation to Hope. In this section of the letter, Paul sought to restore the Thessalonians' hope. Timothy's report affirmed their continued faith and love but omitted any reference to hope (3:6). Some within their midst had died, and they were in danger of grieving without hope (4:13). Paul's response was two-fold. First, he shared a hope-giving word from the Lord (4:15b) clarifying the status of those who had died, the "dead in Christ" (4:16). They would participate in both the resurrection and the parousia as equals of those alive when Jesus returns. Second, in 5:1–11, Paul used the end-time teachings of Jesus to exhort believers (those who are living and waiting for Christ to come) to continual watchfulness. Watchfulness is required to maintain hope. Maintaining hope is neither easy nor natural. Both sections—whether dealing with the situations of those dead or those living—conclude with an appeal to comfort, edify, or encourage (parakaleō) one another with these words (4:18; 5:11). First-century disciples were expected not only to imitate their teacher's deeds but also to repeat the teacher's words and teachings. As good disciples, the Thessalonians were to repeat Paul's words, whether concerning the dead (4:13–17) or the living (5:1–10), thereby imitating and extending his pastoral concern for them to one another.

Paul starts this section by affirming that he did not want the Thessalonians to be unaware regarding those who were asleep in death (v. 13). This contrasts sharply with Paul's repeated affirmations of the Thessalonians' knowledge ("you know"; 1:4; 2:1, 2, 5, 11; 3:3, 4; 4:2; 5:2) and signals this as the revelatory heart of the letter. The result of this ignorance was that they were in danger of grieving as others (hoi loipoi; lit. the "rest" or "remnant") having no hope (v. 13). Pagan Gentiles held a variety of beliefs about the afterlife. Some believed in the finality of death. Others argued for an immortal soul that survived death. Such ideas were usually vague and, it seems, not widely held. The result was a general hopelessness in the face of death. In contrast, Paul sought to comfort believers with a transforming revelation of hope grounded on the communal confession that "Jesus died and rose again" (v. 14; Rom. 10:9). Paul reasoned that if Jesus died and rose, so too would God bring with him those who sleep in Jesus (1 Thess. 4:14). The metaphor of death as a sleep reflects the Judeo-Christian belief that death is only a temporary state from which all will awake at the resurrection, when God judges the world (cf. Dan. 12:2).

The reference to God bringing with Him those who sleep has been taken by some to indicate that God will return from heaven with the disembodied souls of the righteous. The Greek has Paul saying that the dead believers have "fallen asleep through Jesus." This is unusual, in that Paul normally refers to those who have died as being dead "in Christ" (1 Thess. 4:16). The phrase "through Jesus" could equally well belong with "God will bring." Greek word order is relatively flexible and allows for this interpretation. This would result in Paul saying that Jesus is the means through whom God will receive the resurrected dead. Thus, the passage could be read as saying that God, through Jesus, will bring with Him (Jesus) those who are sleeping (v. 14). This interpretation is supported by the order of events depicted in vv. 15–17.

A climatic word of the Lord in vv. 15–17 clarifies beyond doubt the future of those asleep in Jesus. Some scholars have taken the last part of v. 15 alone as the word. In this case, vv. 16–17 are Paul's explanatory comments. Other scholars have seen vv. 15–17 in total as the word. In terms of its origin, the word may be an agraphon, a quotation of Jesus that was unrecorded in the Gospels (e.g., Acts 20:35). Alternatively, it may be a prophetic pronouncement given directly to Paul that provides further revelation of the teachings of the earthly Jesus (Acts 9:12; 16:9; 18:9; 22:17; 2 Cor. 12:1, 7; Gal. 1:12). Whatever its length or origin, the word of the Lord appears here as a direct appeal to the highest source of authority possible. The Thessalonians might hope because the Lord Jesus Himself had shared a unique revelation with them in their grief. In their darkest hour, the Lord would not remain silent. He had spoken.

The word of the Lord (1 Thess. 4:15) was communicated to ensure that the grieving Thessalonians would understand its message. It is replete with familiar OT and extra-biblical Jewish imagery. The Lord will return with a cry of command, the voice of an archangel (Jude 9), and the trumpet of God (Ex. 19:16, 19; Is. 27:13; Joel 2:1; Zeph. 1:16; Matt. 24:31). The dead in Christ will, following their resurrection, be caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord. In the OT, clouds often serve as evidence of God's presence and occasionally as a heavenly vehicle of God (Ezek. 1:4–28; Dan. 7:13). In addition to this imagery, Paul employed terms readily understandable to all members of his audience. The Lord's return will be His parousia or "presence" (1 Thess. 4:15). This Greek term is used in a technical sense to refer to the visit of a ruler or dignitary to a city. The inhabitants would send a delegation to meet, welcome, and petition the approaching ruler (see commentary on 1 Thess. 3:11–13). The technical term for such a meeting was apantēsis ("meeting"), Paul's very word describing the meeting of the righteous with the Lord in the air (4:17). This mixture of Jewish and Greco-Roman imagery would require any Gentile believers unfamiliar with the OT imagery to seek help from their Jewish brothers and sisters to understand Paul's message, thereby knitting the community closer together in a time of grief.

The Lord's revelatory word (v. 15) favorably compares two groups: those already dead and those who would remain living until the parousia. Nothing is said about the fate of the wicked or the nature of the post-resurrection physical transformation (1 Cor. 15:51–57). Paul's writing was not out of curiosity but in order to comfort. His emphasis was to assure the Thessalonians that those who had died in Christ would participate in the dramatic events of the Second Coming. They would not be disadvantaged, for example, by being resurrected but somehow missing out at the parousia. Some Jews held that only those alive at the end of the age would be carried to heaven, while the righteous dead would be resurrected but remain on earth. Related to this view, Paul's emphasis on divine wrath could easily have been misconstrued (1:10; 2:16). Paul might have been arguing against a belief that the death of believers was a form of divine punishment that would disadvantage them. In contrast to such views, he revealed that those asleep in Christ would be resurrected and rise with those alive to meet Him in the air (4:16–17). This

The Rapture

The word "rapture" is derived from the Latin translation of the Greek verb harpazō, translated as "caught up" in 1 Thessalonians 4:17. The word literally means "to grab or seize suddenly," "to snatch," or "to take away." It indicates both the suddenness and irresistible force of the event. There will be, however, nothing secret about this "rapture." The return of Jesus will be not only visible (cf. Matt. 24:27, 30–31; Acts 1:11; Rev. 1:7) but also loudly audible. However, it is not the loud noise itself that will raise the dead but the loud, authoritative, and divine command from Jesus that will summon the dead to return to the realm of the living.

description demonstrates an equality of experience between the two groups, signaled through the threefold use of the preposition "with" ("with Him"/"Jesus," "God," v. 14; "with them," v. 17a; "with the Lord," v. 17b). The promise relating to the climax of these shared events is that we will be with the Lord forever (v. 17). Paul does not comfort those grieving simply by assuring them that they will see their dead friends or relatives again, true as that will certainly be. He redirects their focus to their future reunion with Jesus. Paul's word here signals divine approval and ultimately gives hope, requiring no further comment by him.

5:1–11. The Day of the Lord. In addition to being worried about the fate of those who had died, the Thessalonians were also anxious about being prepared for the parousia themselves. They had come to believe that knowing the times or dates related to Christ's return (Acts 1:7) would enable them to be better prepared for it. Paul reminded the Thessalonians of the pointlessness of trying to determine the time of Christ's return, because as he had told them previously, it would be unexpected and sudden. Consistent with contemporary paraenetic practice, he diplomatically affirmed that they had no need that he should write (1 Thess. 5:1), that they knew the material he desired to share (v. 2), and that they were already doing that which he required (v. 11). This rhetoric probably matched the reality—much of the imagery in this section is highly reminiscent of that found in the end-time sections of the Synoptic Gospels. Paul would have taught the Thessalonians these teachings during his stay. The coming of the "day of the Lord" as a "thief in the night" (v. 2) accords with the teachings of Jesus on the coming of the Son of Man (Matt. 24:43–44; Luke 12:39–40). The "day of the Lord" is portrayed as a destructive event that would come with the suddenness of a woman entering labor (Matt. 24:8; Mark 13:8). Also like Jesus, Paul stressed the unexpectedness of the Day of the Lord, and called believers to constant watchfulness (1 Thess. 5:6; see Matt. 24:36–42, 44; Mark 13:32–37). Paul's point is clear: The solution to the Thessalonians' anxiety about the return of Christ was not to know the "when" of the return but to stay alert spiritually and not allow themselves to become complacent in their faith.

Paul used the theme of "the day" to structure his appeal. He started by affirming that the timing of "the day of the Lord" is unknown and that it would catch those who say "peace and safety" (1 Thess. 5:3) by surprise. "Peace and safety" was a highly charged political slogan used in imperial propaganda to justify the continued existence and expansion of the Roman Empire. This peace was enforced through the use of brutal military force as experienced personally by Paul and his coworkers (Acts 16:19–24; 2 Cor. 6:4–10). Those who trust in such kingdoms will not escape the destruction that will occur when God saves His people from such earthly powers on the day of judgment (Joel 1:15; 2:31–32; Amos 5:18–20; Obad. 15; Zeph. 1:14–16; Zech. 14:1–21; 1 Cor. 5:5; 2 Thess. 2:2). Paul then used the theme of "the day" to contrast the people of God with outsiders. Members of God's family are sons of the day and light and thus remain watchful, awake, and sober (1 Thess. 5:5–6, 8). Those of the night and darkness sleep and get drunk (vv. 4–7). Again, Paul was using very familiar imagery. Within Judaism and throughout the NT, darkness and night represent the state of those in spiritual ignorance and apathy. In contrast, those in a state of readiness and truth are of the day and in the light (Matt. 4:16; 6:23; Luke 11:35; 22:53; John 3:19; 11:9–10; Eph. 5:8–9; 1 Pet. 2:9; 1 John 2:8–11). Paul heightened this contrast by alternating throughout the passage from one group to the other. In effect, Paul defines in both positive and negative terms what it means to be part of the people of God.

After restoring the Thessalonians' hope of salvation through a word of the Lord and exhorting them to watchfulness, Paul was then in a position to conclude his faith, love, and hope theme introduced in 1 Thess. 1:3. He encouraged those of "the day" in 5:8 to clothe themselves with the breastplate of faith and love and the helmet of the hope of salvation (compare Rom. 13:12–13; 2 Cor. 6:7; 10:4; Eph. 6:13–17). With the addition of hope, they were then in a position to fully clothe themselves with the spiritual armor necessary to survive the sudden destruction that would come on those trusting in the peace and security configured by the world (1 Thess. 5:3).

Paul refers in vv. 9–10 to "our Lord Jesus Christ," who "died for us." This is the only place in the epistle where Paul addresses the purpose of the death of Jesus. The fact that he did not develop the topic most probably indicates that the Thessalonians had a good understanding of the purpose of the death of Jesus (see 1 Cor. 15:3). One of the challenges the apostles had was explaining the reason for the death of their Messiah. Therefore, an answer must have been provided from the very beginning of the Christian church. Here we find probably one of the earliest understandings. The phrase "died for us" could mean that He died as our substitute or for our benefit; the one does not exclude the other. The context supports this interpretation. It suggests that His death was salvific for us because it delivered us from the wrath of God mentioned in 1 Thessalonians 5:9–10. Besides, since His death is contrasted with the promise of living together with Him, we can conclude that His death occurred in order for us to live. A life is given for the lives of others. These ideas would be further developed by Paul and other apostles, making Jesus's death absolutely central in the theology of the NT.

We also find cases where salvation is directly associated with the resurrection of Jesus. This is specifically the case in Acts 1–8. In the speeches of the apostles, Jesus's death is consistently portrayed as a brutal act of murder (Acts 2:23; 3:14–15; 4:10; 5:30–31; 7:52). The apostles repeatedly quote the OT to chacterize His death in several ways, including to show that His death was nevertheless an avoidance of the corruption or decay of His flesh (Ps. 16:10 in Acts 2:31), an act of rejection (Ps. 118:22 in Acts 4:11), rebellion (Ps. 2:1–2 in Acts 4:25–26), humiliation, and a denial of justice (Is. 53:7b–8a in Acts 8:32–33). In contrast, salvation was proclaimed as available to all who call on the name of Jesus (Acts 2:21; 3:6; 4:12–18, 10:43; 22:16; see also Luke 24:47; Rom. 10:13; 1 Cor. 1:2).

First Thessalonians also focuses on the resurrection of Jesus. Throughout the letter, Jesus is the one whom God raised from the dead (1:10), who was killed by the Jewish leaders (2:14–15), and who died and rose again (4:14). In this context (5:10–11), Jesus appears as the one who died for us so that, whether we are awake or asleep, we might live together with Him (vv. 10–11). The emphasis on the resurrection does not indicate lack of reflection on the salvific power of the death of Christ but assumes it. In fact, 1 Thessalonians confesses the two together: "we believe that Jesus died and rose again" (4:14).

In Greco-Roman literature, heroes were held up as embodying particular virtues that deserved imitation. Heracles was the model of endurance and Penelope of faithfulness. In this epistle, Jesus is not presented as merely the embodiment of a particular virtue. Rather, through Jesus's own death and resurrection, God Himself had provided a life-giving paradigm that the Thessalonians might imitate. They too, though they die, might "imitate" Jesus through their resurrection from the dead. Those who would identify with Jesus in His death would imitate Him in His life (1 Cor. 6:14; Phil. 3:10–11). This would help remove any sense of crisis the Thessalonians might have experienced as a result of deaths within their community.

Paul's words were intended to assure the Thessalonians that they had nothing to fear about Christ's return because God did not appoint them to wrath but to the possession of salvation (1 Thess. 5:9). God was not against them, but rather He was on their side. After all, God took the initiative in saving humans by sending Jesus to die for the sins of the world (John 3:16; Rom. 5:6–10). So, whether the Thessalonians would live to see the parousia or would die before its occurrence, they had nothing to worry about. Their eternal destiny was secure in Christ.

5:12–28

Final Exhortations and Greetings

Paul's letter concludes with final appeals (vv. 12–22), a wish-prayer (vv. 23–25), greetings (vv. 26–27), and a benediction (v. 28). The appeals are general maxims that cover five areas: attitudes toward leaders (vv. 12–13); exhortations to those in particular need (v. 14); personal relationships (v. 15); the religious life (vv. 16–18); and living with the Spirit (vv. 19–22). The call "to serve the true and living God" (1:9) is to impact every area of the believer's life. Many of the maxims here include verb forms with similar sounding endings in the Greek. The effect of this repetition is to bind the exhortations into a rhetorical unit, in which no one exhortation should be singled out for special attention or subject to neglect. It also makes them easier to memorize. His maxims include (lit.): "always rejoice" (chairete; 5:16); "constantly pray" (proseuchesthe; v. 17); "give thanks" in everything (eucharisteite; v. 18); "the Spirit, do not quench" (sbennyte; v. 19); "prophesy, do not despise" (exoutheneite; v. 20); "all things, test" (dokimazete; v. 21); "to good, hold fast" (katechete; v. 21); and "from every kind of evil, abstain" (apechesthe; v. 22). The genre of these exhortations would have been highly familiar to the Thessalonians. Greco-Roman philosophers used such short, pithy sayings to encapsulate their teachings. Students of philosophy were taught to keep such maxims "ready to hand" so that whatever situation they encountered, they always had a guiding principle to shape their response.

In sharing these maxims, Paul provided the people of God with revealed, general truths that he expected them to memorize, constantly meditate on, and use as guiding principles, thus allowing God to shape their lives in holiness (see Rom. 12:9–21; 1 Cor. 6:12–13; 1 Pet. 3:8–12). They are not to apply the principles blindly, but rather with pastoral sensitivity they are to ensure that the medicine matches the ailment (1 Thess. 5:14). This was and is a fundamental principle of good pastoral care. Not only had Paul restored the Thessalonians' hope (4:13—5:11), but as a good teacher, he had also provided them with sufficient principles to guide them in any and every situation they might face. Note the repeated use of "always," "all," and "every" throughout this section. Paul was forced by persecution to leave Thessalonica and to maintain his presence among the Thessalonian believers from a distance through his coworker Timothy (3:1–3) and then through his letter. Through these maxims that summarize his ethos and teachings, he hoped to continue to influence the lives of the believers. It is thus with confidence—having provided the Thessalonians with sufficient instruction—that he appealed to God to totally sanctify them, so that as the people of God they would be blameless at the Second Coming (5:23). He who called them to be His people would deliver them because He is faithful (v. 24; 1 Cor. 1:8–9). The hope that Paul renewed in the hearts of the Thessalonians influenced the way they lived while waiting for the return of the Lord.

2 THESSALONIANS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. Like other personal letters in antiquity, Paul's second letter to the Thessalonians did not originally have a title attached to it. As it was copied and shared with other churches, it was given the title "To the Thessalonians II" (Pros Thessalonikeis B) in the earliest Greek manuscripts to distinguish it from Paul's other correspondence. Later scribes expanded the title in some manuscripts to include the name of the Apostle Paul, while in other copies they mistakenly identified the letter as being written from Athens (following a common assumption at the time connected to 1 Thessalonians), and in a few they even claimed it was written from Rome.

The opening salutation identifies Paul, Silas (also called Silvanus), and Timothy as the senders of the letter. While Silas and Timothy may have been with Paul as the letter was written, it is unlikely that they were anything like joint authors. Paul was clearly the primary author. While the first-person plural "we" is used from time to time (e.g., 1:3; 2:1; 3:4), Paul identifies himself as the principal author (2:5; 3:17), and the style and language of the letter are also his. Another clear indication of Paul's authorship is that the letter ends with his signature alone (3:17).

Silas was Paul's traveling companion and coworker during the second missionary journey, after the apostle's separation from Barnabas (Acts 15:36–41). Timothy was Paul's convert in Lystra during the second missionary journey and later joined Paul in his ministry (Acts 16:1–4). These two men brought Paul the report of the situation in the Thessalonian church (1 Thess. 3:1–6; cf. Acts 18:5). Paul may have identified these two men as co-senders of the letter due to their relationship with the Thessalonians and because they may have provided Paul with some sort of secretarial assistance in the writing process, as was the case with his other letters (e.g., Rom. 16:22).

Paul's authorship of 2 Thessalonians was supported throughout church history. However, in the nineteenth century, the authenticity of the letter began to be disputed. Today, 1 Thessalonians is generally recognized as written by Paul, but the authenticity of 2 Thessalonians is rejected among critical scholars. One of the arguments against the traditional understanding is the strong similarity between 1 and 2 Thessalonians. Some critical scholars do not believe Paul would have written two letters with so many similarities in such a short span of time. Others cast doubt on the authenticity of 2 Thessalonians on the basis of what they believe are alleged differences in the theology of the two letters. According to these scholars, the Second Coming in 1 Thessalonians is described as soon and imminent—Paul implied that it would occur in his lifetime (1 Thess. 4:16–17)—whereas in 2 Thessalonians it would be preceded by a great apostasy and the revelation of the man of sin/lawlessness.

Many other scholars do not find these arguments persuasive. While a close examination of the two letters does indicate that they share a strong similarity in style and language, it seems unwarranted to conclude that the similarity the letters share is credible evidence of the inauthenticity of 2 Thessalonians. It seems far more logical to conclude that these two letters share so much in common because Paul wrote them both. After all, why would the apostle not revert to the same terminology when addressing a similar issue a second time—especially if the second letter was written closely after the first? The claim that the two letters advocate vastly different theological views is also far from convincing. Instead of being contradictory, the theological differences are really a case of different emphases. This is exactly what one would expect to find since 2 Thessalonians was written to correct some misunderstandings the Thessalonians had regarding Paul's statements about the Second Coming in his first letter. For example, whereas he highlighted the imminence of Christ's return in 1 Thessalonians, in his second letter he reminded them that as they were awaiting the return of Jesus, they should not withdraw from life in this world, because certain events must take place before the Lord returns (2:1–2; 3:6–12). These two views are not contradictory. Paul was merely providing the Thessalonians with more detail about the same subject. Although there are certainly some challenging issues of interpretation, there is no valid reason for denying that Paul was the author of 2 Thessalonians.

Date. Paul probably wrote his second letter to the Thessalonians not long after 1 Thessalonians, perhaps only a few months later. His two coworkers, Silas and Timothy, were still with him (1:1; cf. Acts 18:5). The letter was written to address concerns raised by reports coming back to Paul from Thessalonica while he was still at Corinth. It may well be that the letter bearer of 1 Thessalonians brought back a report of the recipients' response to Paul's first letter and of other events taking place in the Thessalonian church. Since Paul stayed in Corinth for a year and a half, 2 Thessalonians was most likely written either in late A.D. 50 or sometime in A.D. 51.

Backgrounds. Paul established the church in Thessalonica during his second missionary journey (Acts 17:1–4); but after working in the city for a few weeks, he was forced to leave suddenly because of persecution, thereby leaving the new converts at a very difficult time. While Paul traveled to Berea and then on to Athens, his concern for the spiritual well-being of the new converts in Thessalonica compelled him to send Timothy back to the city to strengthen them spiritually (1 Thess. 3:1–2). When Timothy and Silas eventually joined Paul in Corinth, they provided Paul with a report of the situation in the church (2 Thess. 3:11). This prompted the apostle to write a warm and personal letter to the church (1 Thessalonians) in order to assure them of his love and to encourage and strengthen them, especially those who had lost loved ones.

The bearer of 1 Thessalonians eventually returned, bringing Paul an update about the church. The believers were still undergoing persecution (2 Thess. 1:4–5). Some among them had misunderstood what Paul wrote in 1 Thessalonians about the Second Coming and were caught up with end-time excitement (2:2). Also, the idleness that Paul had addressed in the first letter (1 Thess. 4:10–12) was now more serious; the excitement about the Lord's soon return had led some of them to stop working (2 Thess. 3:11–12). All of this caused great disruption in the life of the church. Upon learning of these new developments, Paul decided to write a second letter, with the primary purpose of correcting the misunderstanding regarding the timing of the Lord's return (2:1–12), but also to encourage the church members who were experiencing the hardship of persecution (1:5–12) and to instruct them in orderly conduct and righteous living (3:6–15).

Theology and Purpose. As Paul's second letter to the church in Thessalonica, the theology of 2 Thessalonians builds on the theological content of the first letter.

1. The Godhead. The central foci of 2 Thessalonians are God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ, both of whom are the source of grace and peace (1:1–2, 12; 3:16). They loved the Thessalonian believers, gave them eternal comfort and eternal hope by grace, and would establish them in every good word and work (2:16-17; 3:3). But the book also refers to all three members of the Godhead as working together for the salvation of human beings. God the Father had, from the beginning, chosen the Thessalonians for salvation through being sanctified by the Spirit and believing the truth and then called them—through Paul's preaching of the gospel—so that they would have the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ (2:13–14; cf. 1 Thess. 1:3–5). They might go through trials and tribulation, yet the day was coming when God would give them rest from their hardships and repay those who were afflicting them (1:5–9). God is faithful and would protect the Thessalonians from the evil one (3:3–4).

2. Eschatology: The Christian Hope. The whole epistle is written from the perspective of the Second Coming of Christ—the Christian hope—which is referred to in terms of the eschatological Day of the Lord (1:10; 2:1–3). The letter stresses three points with regard to the Second Coming that focus on the particular concerns of the Thessalonian believers.

First, the faithful suffering the hardships of persecution were to find comfort in the hope that their suffering would not last forever. Christ's coming in power and glory would bring them relief and deliverance from persecution and suffering—good news for the faithful but bad news for their oppressors. At Christ's return, "those who do not know God" and "do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" will undergo the righteous judgment of God (1:6–8).

Second, in an effort to correct the misunderstanding of what he had stated regarding Christ's return in 1 Thessalonians, Paul wrote his most extensive description of the final events that would precede the Second Coming (2:1–12), a portrayal that has significant resonances in Revelation 13:1–7. While 1 Thessalonians presents the Second Coming as a joyous event for the faithful, the focus of 2 Thessalonians is on Satan's extensive activities in the world preceding the Second Coming. We should remember, however, that in 2 Thessalonians Paul does not provide an exhaustive description of end-time events; he rather reminds the Thessalonians of what he previously told them (2:5).

Third, in addressing the particular situation of the church in Thessalonica, Paul gave general instructions for how Christians, while awaiting Christ's coming, should conduct themselves—living an exemplary life worthy of their calling (3:6–15; cf. 1 Thess. 4:11). The Christian hope has an impact on the daily lives of believers.

COMMENTARY

INTRODUCTION

The introductory part of 2 Thessalonians is written in the form of a typical Greco-Roman letter, which customarily consisted of the identification of the sender and the recipient(s), a brief greeting, and a thanksgiving (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:1–4; Phil. 1:1–3).

Addressees

Except for a small difference in wording, the prologue of 2 Thessalonians mirrors that of 1 Thessalonians. Although later in the letter Paul twice identifies himself as the primary author (2:5; 3:17), he also names Silas and Timothy as the co-senders (see 1 Thess. 1:1). They were well known to the church because they had been involved in evangelizing Thessalonica (Acts 17:1–10; 1 Thess. 3:2). Timothy and Silas may also have brought Paul a report of the situation in the Thessalonian church (Acts 18:5). They regularly prayed to God regarding the church's spiritual well-being (1 Thess. 1:2–5; 2 Thess. 1:11–12).

The letter is addressed to the church of the Thessalonians. Thessalonica was the capital of the Roman province of Macedonia. It was a seaport city and was located on the major imperial road connecting Rome with the Orient. This made Thessalonica one of the greatest and wealthiest commercial centers of the Roman Empire. It had the status of a free, self-ruled city, which earned it many privileges from the Roman government. The city was crowded with pagan temples in which rituals were performed, and citizens were expected to participate in the festivities. Those who did not participate faced persecution and social isolation, as well as the loss of their legal status. This caused serious problems for the Christian community in the city.

The Greek word ekklēsia ("church") denotes an assembly. This assembly of Christians was those who had responded to the gospel message preached by Paul and his associates and who had turned away from idolatry "to serve the living and true God" (1 Thess. 1:8–9). They are described as being "in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thess. 1:1). Paul may have been pointing to two things here. First, both the senders and the believers in Thessalonica belonged to one Father and, as such, were brothers and sisters of the same family of God; Paul regularly addresses them in the epistle as his siblings (2:1, 13; 3:1, 6, 13). Second, the God in whom the Christians in Thessalonica were established was not a distant deity but the One who was in a close relationship with them and interested in their well-being in the same way an earthy parent cares about his or her own children. The church was, at that time, going through persecution and the confusion of theological misunderstandings. Thus, they were in need of encouragement and correction concerning their beliefs.

Paul referred to Jesus Christ as "the Lord" (kyrios; "master"; also in 1:2). The twofold designation of Jesus as Christ (or Messiah) and the Lord is central to the gospel Paul preached. The former indicates what Jesus has done for us, while the latter designates His claim on us. As our Lord, He demands our obedience and undivided service.

Greeting and Thanksgiving

Following the customary practice of including a greeting, Paul salutes the church with the common greeting among early Christians: grace and peace (cf. Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3; Phil. 1:2). This greeting conjoins the customary Greek greeting charis ("grace") and the Hebrew greeting shalom (Gr. eirēnē; "peace"), which expresses the idea of well-being. This phrase, however, conveys more than a mere conventional greeting. It expresses an important theological concept. Grace and peace are intrinsically related; they always go in the order of "grace and peace." Grace refers to God's unmerited favor bestowed on the believer, resulting in peace that the Thessalonians might enjoy in the midst of persecution and suffering. The source of grace and peace is God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. Here, Paul repeated the wording from the previous address (see 2 Thess. 1:1).

In the Greek text, 2 Thessalonians 1:3–10 consists entirely of one sentence, focusing on the events that will take place at the Second Coming. But Paul began by addressing the believers as adelphoi (sometimes translated as "brothers" or "brethren," but also including "sisters"); they were his siblings (see 2:1, 13; 3:1, 6, 13). This points to the intimate relationship between them. They were all members of one spiritual family, and God was their Father (1:1). Paul and his coworkers felt that they ought to thank God always on their behalf, as was appropriate (v. 3). Previously, Paul worried about the faith of the Thessalonians (see 1 Thess. 3:1–10), but now he was compelled to thank God on their behalf. While in 1 Thessalonians he commended them for their work of faith, labor of love, and patience of hope in the Lord Jesus Christ (1 Thess. 1:3), he also constantly prayed that their faith would grow and that their love toward one another would increase and abound (1 Thess. 3:10–12). Now, months later, Paul was able to see that there was continual growth of their faith and that their love for each other was also increasing (2 Thess. 1:3). In the Greek, the verbs used here are in the present tense, which points to a continual experience; their growth in faith and love is ongoing. Thus, Paul felt suitably compelled to thank God for them in his prayers.

This growth of faith and love toward each other was something that Paul and his coworkers could boast about among the other churches he visited (v. 4). This is especially significant because their patience/perseverance and faith were manifested in the midst of the persecution and trouble they were undergoing. In this, the Thessalonians had become a model of Christian faithfulness.

1:5–12

Encouragement in Persecution

In this section, Paul provided encouragement to the Thessalonians as they underwent persecution, pointing to God's righteous judgment at the Second Coming (vv. 5–10). He referred to both positive and negative aspects of judgment: the vindication and reward for the persecuted Thessalonian believers and the punishment for their persecutors. He concluded this section by assuring the members of his constant prayers for them (vv. 11–12).

1:5–10. God's Righteous Judgment. Paul saw the patience and faith of the Thessalonians in the midst of persecution as evidence of God's righteous judgment (v. 5). The judgment in view here refers to the future judgment. The Greek word endeigma means "evidence," "indication," or "proof," and dikaios means "righteous" or "just." In what way was the tribulation of the Thessalonians proof that God's judgments are justified? Paul wanted to assure them that their tribulation was not evidence of God's disfavor against them but that God's righteous judgment would demonstrate their being "counted worthy of the kingdom of God" (v. 5). The patience and faith they had manifested in the ongoing persecution were the clear evidence of God's power working in their lives. The future judgment would vindicate them and show that God was working on their behalf (see 1 Pet. 4:13).

On the other hand, the persecution and affliction of the Thessalonians were the evidence that it is just and righteous for God to avenge His people and to take vengeance on those who afflicted and wronged them (2 Thess. 1:6). In his letters, Paul often mentioned God's retribution against those who wrong His people (cf. Rom. 12:19). The afflicters and persecutors of God's people will have to face the coming righteous judgments of God—bad news for the wicked but good news for believers. On the day of divine retribution, when God will afflict the afflicters, He will give respite to those who have been troubled (2 Thess. 1:7). The Greek word anesis means "loosening," "rest," or "relief." God's people will get relief from their suffering on the day when the Lord Jesus will be revealed from heaven accompanied by His strong angels (cf. 1 Thess. 4:16). Jesus spoke of His coming accompanied by angels (Matt. 24:30–31; 25:31). The verb "revealed" is a translation of the Greek noun apokalypsis, meaning "uncovering," "unveiling," or "revelation," as in the name of the last book of the NT. The word denotes uncovering something that was previously hidden. The literal translation of the clause "when the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven" (2 Thess. 1:7) is "at the uncovering of the Lord Jesus from heaven." Christ's presence with His people on earth and His care for them are for now hidden to the eyes of the world. The Second Coming will result in the full uncovering of the presence of Jesus Christ and His care for His people.

The revealing of Jesus from heaven will be in burning fire to execute vengeance on those who do not know God and do not obey the gospel of Jesus (v. 8). In the Bible, the execution of divine judgment is regularly associated with fire (cf. Is. 66:15–16; 2 Pet. 3:10–12). The Greek word ekdikēsis can mean "vengeance" or "vindication," the rendering of justice. This is in agreement with Paul's earlier reference to God's righteous judgment and His just retribution on those who wrong and afflict His people (2 Thess. 1:5–6). The phrases, "those who do not know God" and "do not obey the gospel" describe those who have knowingly and willfully turned away from God and have chosen to disobey the gospel of Jesus Christ. In Greek, "the gospel of Jesus Christ" may mean "the gospel from Jesus Christ" (subjective genitive) or "the gospel about Jesus Christ" (objective genitive). Either fits the context. The gospel has its origin in Jesus Christ, who is also the focus of the gospel.

Those who have chosen to disobey the gospel of Jesus Christ shall be "punished with everlasting destruction" (v. 9). Paul here refers to the eternal annihilation of sinners. The mortal body is not able to stand in the presence of God's glory. Revelation 6:15–17 describes those who have spurned God's grace as trying to hide themselves from God's face and exclaiming that no one can endure His wrath.

The coming of Christ is the moment when He will be glorified in His holy people (the saints), who will be in awe of Him (2 Thess. 1:10). With the annihilation of evil, Christ will bring deliverance to those who, by believing, responded to and accepted the gospel. This is in contrast to those who chose not to believe the truth; these will be condemned and will receive eternal destruction (2:12). This is how Christ will be glorified and honored among His people.

1:11–12. Praying for the Thessalonians. In closing this section, Paul assured the Thessalonians that he and his coworkers were continually praying for them, just as he prayed for other churches (see Rom. 1:9–10; Eph. 1:16; Phil. 1:3–4). He asked God, first, to consider them worthy of His calling (2 Thess. 1:11)—that God might activate their calling through a life corresponding to His calling (cf. 1 Thess. 2:12). This mirrors what he later wrote to the Ephesians when he urged them to live (lit. "walk") "worthy of the calling" they had received (Eph. 4:1). The Thessalonian believers had been called to be His representatives, so Paul prayed that they would be worthy of that calling.

He also prayed that God would finish ("fulfill") what He had begun among the Thessalonians: His desire or goodwill for them, which flowed from the goodness of His nature (or, according to some renderings, the desires of the believers for goodness), and the works of faith powerfully executed in their lives of service. This was so that the name of the Lord might be glorified in them, and they in Him (2 Thess. 1:12). This statement echoes what Paul previously stated in v. 10; the glorification of Christ's name would result in the glorification of His people. It reminds us of Jesus's prayer in John 17, when He said that He was glorified in the disciples (John 17:10), then prayed that His followers would one day share in His glory (John 17:24). All of this is possible because of "the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thess. 1:12). Grace is God's unmerited favor shown to humanity and made available through Jesus Christ (cf. 1 Thess. 1:1). It was the source of the hope of the Thessalonian believers as they faced persecution and affliction due to their faithfulness to the gospel.

2:1–12

THE GREAT APOSTASY

Paul next turned to correcting some misconceptions regarding the Second Coming among the Thessalonian believers. In correcting them, he delineated the events in the world prior to Christ's return. He discussed the man of sin/lawlessness (vv. 1–4), the restrainer (vv. 5–7), and the coming of Satan (vv. 8–12). Paul's intention was not to provide a detailed description of last-day events but rather to reiterate what he had previously taught the Thessalonians (v. 5).

Misunderstanding the Coming of Christ

Paul began the discussion by addressing the Thessalonians as his siblings (Gr. adelphoi; "brethren" or "brothers and sisters"; see 1:3), which indicates that he was beginning a new section. The issues he wanted to address were related to the coming of Jesus and being gathered together to Him (2:1; see Matt. 24:31). He had discussed these at length in his first letter (1 Thess. 4:15–17), but apparently some new developments had since taken place. Paul admonished the members to not be nervously shaken or disturbed (2 Thess. 2:2). The word tacheōs ("quickly," "soon") refers to the very short time since Paul initially spoke to them about this subject. Paul used three words to describe the threat they were then facing. The first is saleuō. In Greek, it refers to something being tossed or swayed by stormy winds or waves (cf. Luke 6:48). The word nous refers to the reason, the process of thinking. The Thessalonian believers were in danger of being quickly tossed away in their way of thinking by the winds of an erroneous teaching. The third word, throeō ("disturbed," "alarmed") refers to the inward emotional anxiety caused by disturbing news (cf. Matt. 24:6).

The Thessalonian believers were relatively new converts who were not yet firmly established in Scripture. They were alarmed by speculative teachings introduced among them supposedly coming from Paul. The phrase "by spirit" or "by a prophecy" most likely refers to false prophets claiming to have authority from the Holy Spirit. The references to "word" and "letter" refer to either a false letter sent in Paul's name or a misinterpretation of something he wrote in his authentic letters. The latter is in agreement with 2 Thessalonians 2:15, where Paul urges believers to uphold what they were taught by his words or in his writings to them.

Whatever the source of their confusion, the Thessalonians were attracted to the idea that the Day of Christ had come. The Greek verb anestēken is in the perfect tense, meaning "has come," not "is near" or "at hand." The Thessalonian believers assumed that somehow Jesus had already returned, perhaps in a spiritual sense (cf. 2 Tim. 2:17–18). Whatever the case, they clearly failed to heed Paul's warning in 1 Thessalonians regarding date-setting for Christ's return (5:1–3) and the knowledge that Christ's coming will be literal and visible (4:15–17). Their mistaken views had an alarmingly negative impact on their spiritual life and conduct (see 2 Thess. 3:6–15).

The Apostasy

Paul emphatically rejected such erroneous teachings as a deception (v. 3). In His eschatological discourse on the Mount of Olives, Jesus spoke about the danger of deception (Matt. 24:4-5, 11). While in 1 Thessalonians 5:2 Paul told the Thessalonians that Christ's coming would be sudden, he now explained that it would not occur until two related events had taken place (the clause "that [d]ay will not come" is not found in the Greek text, but is appropriately supplied by most translators). First, the apostasia (sometimes translated as "falling away") regularly denotes political or military rebellion—in this case, against God. Paul's use here is in a spiritual sense, referring to an upcoming religious uprising and rebellious opposition to God orchestrated by evil forces.

Then, in the context of that great rebellion, "the man of sin" (some manuscripts read "the man of lawlessness"; ho anthrōpos tēs anomias) would be revealed. The word "man" with the definite article shows that Paul refers to a definite figure or power. Later verses refer to the mystery or secret power of lawlessness (2 Thess. 2:7) and "the lawless one" (ho anomos; v. 8). These references mirror the words of Jesus that, prior to His coming, lawlessness and wickedness would increase (Matt. 24:12). The genitive noun anomias ("of sin/lawlessness") and the adjectival noun anomos ("the lawless one") describe this man of sin/lawlessness as the figure acting contrary to the law and opposing God's government and order.

The coming of the man of sin/lawlessness is described in Greek using the word apokalyptō (2 Thess. 2:3, 6, 8), meaning "to uncover" or "unveil" something that was previously hidden. Previously, the noun apokalypsis ("revealing," "unveiling") occurs with reference to Christ's coming (1:7). Although this wicked power was already at work, its revelation was restrained (2:6–7). The unveiling of this lawless one was, from the perspective of Paul, in the future (v. 8). Paul further identified this "man of sin/lawlessness" as "the son of perdition" or "the man doomed to destruction" (v. 3). The identifying phrases "the man of sin" and "the son of destruction" are parallel. While the former points to the rebellious aspect of this anti-Christ figure, the latter spells out his ultimate doom (cf. John 17:12; see "The Antichrist(s)," p. 1909). Paul would next state, concerning this anti-Christ figure, that the Lord would destroy him with the breath of His mouth and the appearance of His coming (2 Thess. 2:8). Thus, Paul begins the description of the lawless one by stating his fate in order to comfort God's people. The approaching great rebellion against God and His work would ultimately come to its end.

This man of lawlessness is unidentified in 2 Thessalonians, but Paul mentions that he had told the Thessalonians about him previously (cf. v. 5). The description that Paul provided, however, gives us some identifying clues. First, his behavior and activities reflect those of Satan in the Bible (v. 4): he opposes God and His work, which brings to mind the same malicious activities of Satan in Zechariah 3:1; he exalts himself above everything divine and all objects of worship, a description recalling the prophecy of the king of the north in Daniel 11:36; and he places himself in God's temple and claims to be God, which recalls the OT portrayal of Satan as exalting himself above God and desiring to sit on God's throne (cf. Is. 14:12–15; Ezek. 28:12–19). This portrayal refers to the work of the little horn described in Daniel (Dan. 7:21–22, 24–25; 8:9–12). According to the prophet, the little horn would interfere with the work of Christ's mediation in the heavenly sanctuary by pretending to exercise a role that belongs only to God and His Son. This attempt to usurp the function of Christ as High Priest manifested itself in history in a system that controlled the church for centuries and that clouded the work of Christ before the Father.

Secondly, Paul describes the activities of the man of sin literally as "the one opposing and exalting himself." The present tense participles in Greek show that Paul considered him to be at work already, something he later explicitly stated (2 Thess. 2:7). The participles point to a continual activity that is not restricted to a particular period. Paul also shows that the lawless one will continue to operate until the Second Coming. These facts point to Satan as the ultimate personification of lawlessness and of all rebellion against God.

We must remember, however, that in his rebellion and opposition to God, Satan has operated through various human agencies, institutions, and systems. Some examples explicitly mentioned in Scripture include Babylon (Is. 14:4, 12–15) and Tyre (Ezek. 28:12–18). It is significant, as already indicated, that Paul's description of the man of sin/lawlessness is based on the prophecies of Daniel regarding the blaspheming figure of the little horn, opposer of God and His people (Dan. 8:9–12, 23–25; 11:36–39). Thus, in describing the man of sin/lawlessness in 2 Thessalonians 2:3–4, Paul foresaw the great apostasy in the Christian church that would occur sometime in the future from his perspective. The only period that fits aptly into this temporal framework is the Middle Ages, during which the established church of Western Europe, with its papal system, united the political and religious powers. The medieval papacy fulfilled the predictions of which both Daniel and Paul spoke.

The Restrainer

Verses 5–6 function as a parenthesis, in which Paul reminds the Thessalonians of his previous teaching regarding these things; he asked them to recall what he had previously shared with them (v. 5). But there is more. He also reminded them that they knew what was holding back (or restraining) the man of sin/lawlessness (v. 6). Paul used the Greek neuter participle (ho katechōn), which might imply an impersonal power. However, in the NT, neuter forms in Greek often denote persons (including the Holy Spirit) rather than things (John 14:17; 16:13; Heb. 7:7). In 2 Thessalonians 2:7, Paul referred to the restrainer as a personal figure. Paul further explained that the mystery (secret power) of lawlessness was already at work at the present time (v. 7). Paul said that, because of the restrainer the lawless one was not yet fully revealed, but that this would change when the restraining one was "taken out of the way" (lit. "until the one restraining now gets out of the middle"). In contrast to the neuter participles used in v. 6, Paul referred to the restrainer with the masculine participle (ho katechōn; "the one restraining").

The restrainer's identity is not specified in 2 Thessalonians—probably because, as Paul stated, the Thessalonians knew who he was. The text establishes several things about the restrainer: Paul referred to him as a personal figure; he was holding back the revelation of the lawless one in Paul's day; his restraining work would end at the proper time; and Paul referred to him as powerful enough to restrain the revelation of Satan and his agents. Among the possible identifications of the restrainer, probably the most likely would be God Himself. He has power to set temporal limits to the revelation of the lawless one. A number of NT texts describe God as restraining the evil forces until an appointed time. In Revelation 7:1–3, God restrained the destructive winds from blowing on the earth, and in 9:1, the removal of the restrainer unleashes the demonic activities. It is also possible that Paul had in mind the Roman Empire, which God used to restrain the revelation of the man of sin/lawlessness for some time.

In summary, in 2 Thessalonians 2:3–7, Paul outlined the course of Christian history from his time until the return of Christ. Before the Second Coming, there would be a rebellion against God, orchestrated by Satan, and the appearance of the man of sin. The lawlessness was already operating undercover in Paul's day because God restrained its full revelation. Then, somewhere in the future from Paul's perspective, God would remove the restraint and the man of sin would be fully revealed (see vv. 3–4). At the end, there would be an outbreak of satanic activities, and Satan, the true antichrist, would launch the greatest deception ever witnessed in history. This is the focus of the following section.

2:8–12

The End-time Revelation of Satan

After the restrainer is removed, "then the lawless one will be revealed" (v. 8). This "then" stands in contrast to "now" in v. 6. At the proper time, God will let the lawless one be "revealed" (apokalyptō; "uncover," "unveil"), which points back to the "revelation" (apokalypsis; "uncovering," "unveiling") of Christ at His coming (1:7). Thus, Paul portrayed the manifestation of the lawless one as the counterfeit of Christ's coming. However, this end-time satanic manifestation will end in total defeat: the Lord will consume him with the breath of His mouth and destroy him with the epiphaneia (lit. "appearance," sometimes translated as "splendor" or "brightness"; 2:8). Paul saw the destruction of this lawless one as the direct fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy of the messianic Branch slaying the wicked with the breath of His mouth (Is. 11:4).

Paul next focused on the end-time drama. He further explained the end-time appearance of the lawless one involving Satan's work: his power, signs, and deceptive wonders (2 Thess. 2:9–10a). Here, Paul again used the word parousia to describe the arrival of the lawless one, the same word he had previously used with reference to the "coming" (parousia) of Christ (v. 1). Thus, the revelation and the coming of Jesus Christ will be preceded by the revelation and coming of Satan. This indicates that Satan will imitate or try to falsify the coming of Christ. He will do this by performing miraculous wonders and signs, just as Jesus did—signs that are evidence of divine power (Acts 2:22). Jesus warned of antichrists imitating His coming by means of deceptive signs and wonders (Matt. 24:24–27). Later, John used that same language to describe the end-time deceptive activities of the lamb-like beast empowered by Satan prior to the Second Coming (Rev. 13:13–14; cf. 16:13–14). Paul used such imagery and language to portray the end-time revelation and activities of Satan as an impersonation of Jesus Christ and a counterfeit of His Second Coming.

The purpose of this end-time revelation of Satan is to deceive those who are perishing because they do not accept or love the truth that could have saved them (v. 10). Paul showed that Satan's end-time deception will be in the context of the preaching of the gospel (cf. Matt. 24:14). It is the acceptance of the gospel and the love of the truth that will protect Christians from the final deception. The love of the truth in 2 Thessalonians 2:10 parallels belief in the truth in v. 12. As a result of rejecting the love for the truth, God will send them a delusion so that they will believe the lie (v. 11). This is another way of saying that God will give them over to their deliberate choices and decisions (cf. Rom. 1:21–26; Rev. 17:17). God will respect their choices and consequently will hand them over to satanic deception. Believing the lie is the result of not loving and believing the truth. They did not believe the truth but were pleased with adikia ("unrighteousness" or "wickedness"; 2 Thess. 2:12). This is in contrast to those who believe and accept God's goodness and power with faith (1:11). While the love of the truth results in salvation (2:10), the rejection of the truth inevitably leads to sin and wrongdoing, which results in condemnation and eternal loss. Our choices have moral implications.

2:13—3:15

EXHORTATIONS AND ADMONITIONS

Following the discussion of the events preceding the Second Coming, Paul provided some practical instructions to the Christians in Thessalonica. This section consists of a series of exhortations and admonitions to stand firm (2:13–17), pray (3:1–5), and live orderly lives (3:6–12).

2:13–17

Stand Firm

Paul hoped that the members of the church would not stray from the truth he had brought to them. So, he endeavored to encourage them to stay firm in the salvation that God had secured for them, concluding with a benedictory wish-prayer. In language reminiscent of 1:3, Paul said that he felt compelled to always give thanks to God for them (2:13). The conjunctive "but" at the beginning of the verse contrasts the ones who did not believe the truth (v. 12)—ones facing eternal destruction (v. 10)—with those who responded with belief in the truth. Feeling compelled to thank God, Paul reminded the believers that God chose them for salvation through the sanctification of the Spirit and belief in the truth (v. 13). Some Greek manuscripts, instead of "from the beginning" (ap' archēs), have "as first fruits" (aparchēn); the difference in Greek is only one letter. God chose them from the beginning, probably meaning "from eternity" (cf. John 15:16; Eph. 1:4; 2 Tim. 1:9), for salvation. The election was not arbitrary because it was connected to sanctification; election is to salvation through sanctification by the Spirit and a commitment to God's truth. God initiated the process and made it effective through the Spirit. Not only did God choose them, but He also called them to salvation through Paul's preaching of the gospel so that they would have the glory of their Lord Jesus Christ (2 Thess. 2:14). Since God had chosen and called them to salvation, He would not let them be lost unless they willingly chose to turn away from Him.

In view of God's work for them, Paul urged the Thessalonians to do two things. He first urged them to remain firm (v. 15). This is the opposite of being quickly shaken and alarmed (see v. 2). He then urged them to hold to the oral and written traditions that they had received from him and his associates (v. 15), in contrast to the inauthentic messages regarding the coming of Christ that he had repudiated in the preceding passage (v. 2). Paul used the word paradosis (lit. "traditions," sometimes translated "teachings") with reference to the instruction he had handed to them by word of mouth or by his letter (cf. 1 Thess. 4:2). The apostle knew that the believers would continue to face the deceptive doctrines of false teachers and that, consequently, they would have to adhere continually to the apostolic teachings of Paul and his associates.

Paul concluded the exhortation with a prayer for the Thessalonians (2 Thess. 2:16–17). They had been shaken and alarmed by false teaching, but in the prayer Paul assured them that God would comfort their hearts and give them stability both in the ongoing persecution and in the teaching they received. This would happen because God loved them and had already given them, by grace, everlasting paraklēsis (variously rendered as "consolation," "comfort," or "encouragement") and hope (v. 16).

Exhortation to Pray

Following his prayer for God to comfort and establish the Thessalonian believers, the apostle next asked them to pray for him and his coworkers. He asked them to pray, first, for the effectiveness of their ministry: that God's word/message would be rapidly spread (lit. "run") and be honored/glorified, just as it was in their case (v. 1). This recalled the response of the people to Paul's preaching in Antioch in Pisidia: they "glorified/honored the word of the Lord" (Acts 13:48). Paul was, at that time, experiencing difficulties and increasing opposition in Corinth by people hostile to the gospel (cf. Acts 18:17). In referring to the spread of the word, Paul used imagery taken from Psalm 147:15, which refers to God's word "running." Additionally, the words "run" and "glorified" placed side by side bring to mind the winning runner at the Isthmian Games—held every two years in Corinth, the city in which Paul wrote his letter—who at the end of the race received due glory and honor.

Second, Paul asked the Thessalonians to pray for divine protection from hostile people for him and his coworkers (2 Thess. 3:2). The definite article in Greek ("from the . . .") identifies this as a specific group of people—those by whom he was surrounded in Corinth (cf. Acts 18:5–17). His observation immediately follows that not everyone has pistis (2 Thess. 3:2). This Greek word may mean either "believing"—in response to the gospel—or "being faithful." The former is seemingly in view here, which is further affirmed by the fact that the Greek text reads "the faith" (with the definite article), denoting the body of Christian beliefs. Paul's opponents in Corinth were unbelievers (2:12).

Paul shifted his focus to the Thessalonian believers (3:3–4), adding that the Lord is faithful. In the Greek text, Paul deliberately used a play on words here. The word pistos ("faithful") is analogous to pistis ("faith") in the previous verse. He stated that human unbelief will not damage the faithfulness of God, which means that He would strengthen and establish the Thessalonian believers and guard them from the evil one. In the Greek, tou ponērou may mean "from the evil" or "from the evil one," namely, Satan. Most likely, the latter is in view. Paul expressed full confidence in the Lord that the Thessalonians were following and that they would continue to follow his instructions to them in spite of all the obstacles Satan had set before them.

Paul offered another prayer on behalf of the Thessalonians (v. 5). The phrases referring to love and patience/perseverance may be interpreted as "God's love for us" and "Christ's patience" or "our love for God" and "our patience for Christ." Both meanings are probably in view here. Paul prayed that God would direct the Thessalonian believers to reflect the same love that God showed toward them and to reproduce the patience that Christ showed while on earth.

3:6–15

Exhortation: Orderly Life

This section contains some ethical instructions that were applicable to the Christians in Thessalonica. The doctrinal misunderstanding of the Second Coming that Paul discussed led him to give practical exhortations to the church.

3:6–10. Idleness in the Church. Paul began this section urging Christians to not associate with unruly, idle members (v. 6). The Greek adverb ataktōs ("out of order," "disorderly") and related terminology described a group of disruptive members who were not working but were "busybodies" instead (v. 11). These people did not live (lit. "walk") according to the teaching tradition that Paul had handed to them when he was with them—both by words and by his example (vv. 7–10). He instructed them that anyone unwilling to work should not eat (v. 10). In the first letter, he had already admonished them to lead a quiet life, to mind their own business, to work with their own hands, and to not live at the expense of others (1 Thess. 4:11–12).

By the time of the writing of 2 Thessalonians, idleness had obviously become a serious problem in the church (3:11–12). Some Christians, alarmed by the prospect of Christ's coming and the end of the world, had given up their work and were waiting in idleness. They refused to listen to Paul's instructions. While in the first letter he urged the members to warn these disorderly persons (1 Thess. 5:14), here, in the second letter, he urged believers to disassociate from them.

In order to convince the Thessalonian believers, Paul pointed to his own example. Repeating almost verbatim what he stated in the first letter (1 Thess. 2:9), he reminded them that, during his stay in Thessalonica, he and his associates were not undisciplined, did not accept food (lit. "bread") from anyone without remunerating them, and worked day and night in order to not be a burden to anyone (2 Thess. 3:7–8). Paul most likely supported himself by tent making, as he did in Corinth (Acts 18:3). He did this not because he did not have the authority or right to accept help but to set himself as an example or model that they should follow. As he indicated when he wrote to the Corinthians, he had the right to ask for the financial support of his ministry because the Lord commanded that "those who preach the gospel" should earn their living by it (1 Cor. 9:14). However, he did not impose this right on anybody in order to avoid hindering the preaching of the gospel (v. 12). In a similar way, he urged the members in Thessalonica to follow his example by working and supporting themselves. In addition to his example, he and his associates repeatedly commanded them that those refusing to work should not be allowed to eat (2 Thess. 3:10). Those unwilling and refusing to work should not be allowed to live at the expense of others.

3:11–12. Warning Against Idleness. After presenting his own example, Paul resumed the theme he started in v. 6. He had heard that some believers were living (lit. "walk") in an unruly, idle, and undisciplined way and meddling into other people's business—they were "busybodies" (v. 11). In his first letter, he admonished such persons and asked the church to warn them of their disruptive behavior (1 Thess. 4:11; 5:14). While the major problem with those persons was the refusal to work, they also occupied themselves with other people's business and interfered in their lives. Their behavior and activities had become disruptive to the church. So, in the language of 1 Thessalonians 4:11–12, Paul commanded and exhorted these people to settle into their own work and earn their own food (lit. "bread"; 2 Thess. 3:12). The hope of the Second Coming does not mean giving up normal living and avoiding necessary duties and work. Paul called on the disorderly ones to conduct themselves according to the tradition he had handed down to them, which excluded idleness and irresponsible behavior and conduct.

3:13–15. Disciplining the Disorderly. In conclusion, Paul addressed the whole church, urging them not to become worn out in doing what was right and good (v. 13). The possible reason for this exhortation is that Paul was aware that the disrupting behavior and activities of some in the church might have caused the faithful members to become dispirited in doing good. Hence, Paul urged them not to lose heart (cf. Gal. 6:9).

In closing, he reiterated what he stated in 2 Thessalonians 3:6, warning them not to have fellowship with those not accepting of his instructions in the letter (v. 14). As noted earlier, in his first letter, Paul instructed the Thessalonians to warn the disorderly (1 Thess. 5:14). Next, he went one step further. If they refused to heed Paul's instruction and comply, the members were to stay away from them (2 Thess. 3:14). His warning about association with them is another way of instructing them to not condone conduct and behavior. In doing this, perhaps, those persons might become ashamed of their behavior. But Paul balanced his counsel by instructing them not to consider or treat them like enemies but to exhort them as brothers or sisters who were part of the family of faith (v. 15). Church discipline is not a matter of personal animosity or hostility but redemptive correction. By referring to the disorderly as a brother or sister, the members in Thessalonica were to keep in mind that such disruptive persons were still members of God's family. Instead of animosity, they should admonish them gently, as siblings, with the purpose of restoring them back into the family of God.

EPILOGUE

The last three verses of 2 Thessalonians, which conclude the letter, consist of Paul's prayer for peace, a salutation, and a benediction of grace. This prayer for peace and grace in vv. 16 and 18 parallels the bestowing of these blessings at the beginning of the letter (1:2).

3:16

Prayer for Peace

Paul had addressed the situation in the Thessalonian church regarding the speculative teachings about the Second Coming and the disorderly behavior of some believers. Closing the letter, he prayed for their peace in all times and circumstances (v. 16). While he refers to "the God of peace" (1 Thess. 5:23) in the closing of the first letter—as he does regularly in his epistles (cf. Rom. 15:33; 2 Cor. 13:11)—here he changed it to "the Lord of peace," implying Jesus Christ. This substitution is obviously deliberate and applicable to the specific situation of the Thessalonian church. In this letter, Paul had just issued instructions to the members on how to deal with those persisting in their disorderly behavior and conduct. Now, he doubtlessly envisioned a possible tension as the believers carried out those instructions. So, he prayed that the Lord of peace Himself might provide them with continual peace toward each other in all circumstances (cf. Eph. 2:14–16). Christ is the only one who could give them the needed peace. The permanency of that peace was a result of Christ's constant presence with them. Paul assured the Thessalonian believers that they were not alone—Jesus Christ was with them and would continue to be with them no matter the situation or circumstances in which they found themselves.

3:17–18

Salutation and Benediction

At this point, Paul identified himself as the author of the letter (v. 17). In writing his letters, Paul normally used secretarial help (cf. Rom. 16:22). But, as he explained, he wrote a salutation with his own hand in the conclusion of the letter (cf. 1 Cor. 16:21; Col. 4:18) in order to ensure the letter's authenticity. Earlier in the letter, Paul pointed to the possibility of spurious letters sent in his name (2 Thess. 2:2).

Paul closed the letter with the customary benediction: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." This benediction is almost identical to the one in the first letter (1 Thess. 5:28) except for the use of "all" here. The verb "be" is not in the Greek text but is supplied by translators; it can also be read as "is with you." This phrase is much more than just a customary benediction. Its purpose was to assure the Thessalonians of their only hope being in the grace of Christ. It embraced all the believers in the Thessalonian church, including the disorderly. The hope and grace of Christ would transform their behavior and conduct and enable the rest of the believers to remain firm in the face of the hardship of persecution and of the problem of false teachings in the church. This benediction applies to all Christians, regardless of time and place, who continue to wait for Christ's coming.

1 TIMOTHY

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. This letter appears in the earliest manuscripts (e.g., the great fourth-century-A.D. Codex Sinaiticus) under the title pros timotheon a: "To Timothy 1." The letter states it was written by Paul to his fellow worker Timothy (1:1–2; cf. Rom. 16:21). Early church fathers accepted Paul as the author. Polycarp, writing between A.D. 110 and 135, alludes to 1 Timothy 6:7 and 6:10, suggesting that he was drawing his instructions from Paul. Similarly, Irenaeus (ca. A.D. 140–202), the Muratorian Canon (A.D. 180–200), Clement of Alexandria (ca. A.D. 150–215), and Tertullian (ca. A.D. 155–220) also acknowledge Paul as the author.

Date. According to 1 Timothy 1:3, Paul left Timothy in charge of the church at Ephesus when he went to Macedonia, expecting to return shortly (cf. 3:14). Since Acts provides us with only a limited outline of Paul's ministry, and nothing at all after his imprisonment at Rome (Acts 28), some scholars suggest the Macedonian trip to which Paul refers occurred at some point during his ministry described in Acts. The most common suggestion is that it was written in the mid-50s A.D.—during or at the end of the apostle's two-year ministry at Ephesus (19:1—20:1). The difficulty with this view is that the strong similarity between 1 Timothy and Titus indicates that the two letters were likely written around the same time. Identifying Paul's Macedonia trip with the account in Acts would necessitate his visit to Crete occurring on his way to Jerusalem some three years later, around A.D. 58. While Paul did stop briefly at Crete at that time, he hardly had enough time to do any evangelization. For this reason, most scholars have rejected this position. The more likely situation is that 1 Timothy was written in the mid-60s A.D., after Paul's release from his first imprisonment in Rome around A.D. 65 or 66.

Backgrounds. Ephesus was the capital of the province of Asia and proud temple keeper of the famed goddess Artemis (Diana). With its prosperous seaport, the city boasted a large and diverse population that made it one of the largest cities of the Roman Empire after Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch. Although Paul was not the founder of the church at Ephesus (Acts 18:24–26), his ministry in the city helped it to become an established center of Christianity (Acts 19). In spite of the strong Christian presence in Ephesus, the believers in the city suffered from both persecution and the influence of false teachers. Paul was threatened by a riot (Acts 19:23–41), fought beasts (1 Cor. 15:32), had many opposing him (1 Cor. 16:8–9), and faced such difficult affliction that he was not sure he would live (2 Cor. 1:8). Regarding false teachings, Paul describes them as "falsely called knowledge" (1 Tim. 6:20) and the teachers as hypocritical liars, eager for gain (6:5), with seared consciences (4:2). They were preoccupied with fables or myths and "endless genealogies" (1:4), corrupted speech, and opposition (6:20, cf. 4:7). They also forbade marriage and promoted dietary restrictions and other forms of physical asceticism (4:3; cf. 4:8).

Theology and Purpose. The Epistle of 1 Timothy was sent to instruct Timothy on how he should act as the leader of the church at Ephesus to protect it from false teachings and other dangers. The specific instructions deal with a diversity of subjects: false teachings (chap. 1), church worship (2:1–15), appointment and characteristics of leaders (chap. 3), care for widows (5:3–16), resolving charges against elders (5:19–22), and behavior of slaves and the wealthy (6:1–2, 17–19). A key concept that provides theological coherence to 1 Timothy is Paul's emphasis on God's way of ordering things (see commentary on 1 Tim. 1:3–7) as the standard for church management. Thus, Paul often resorts to the teachings of the OT to establish order or solve problems in the church (2:13–15; 4:3–5; 6:7) with the purpose of producing love, good conscience, and faith (1:5). But God's way of ordering things is also evident in the salvation He provided through Christ (e.g., 2:3–7; 3:16; 4:10), and that brings with it a hope and trust that we should all embrace (1:1; 4:10; 5:5; 6:17). One could say that the church order Paul promoted in opposition to false teachers is the order that only the gospel can establish and preserve. The fight against false teachings is essentially a defense of the Christian faith.

Literary Features. First Timothy is more than a personal letter from Paul to Timothy. Although it contains specific instructions on how Timothy was to lead the church at Ephesus, many of the instructions are intended for the church in general. It resembles the mandate documents that rulers gave to their subordinates as they were installed into office—instructions that were, in many cases, read and displayed publicly in inscriptions.

COMMENTARY

1:1–20

Opposing False Doctrines

After the greetings (vv. 1–2), Paul addressed three specific issues (vv. 3–7): the need to oppose false teachings, the need for a deep spiritual experience, and the need to gain a proper understanding of the law. He developed these three topics further in the rest of the chapter. He defined the nature of the law (vv. 8–11), used his own experience to define the nature of a true Christian experience (vv. 12–17), and then returned to his charge to Timothy to oppose false teachers (vv. 18–20).

1:1–2. Greeting. Although Paul begins his epistle in customary fashion—identifying himself and the recipient of the letter and sharing a blessing—his greeting also includes key concepts he will pursue more fully later. One of these concepts is connected to his self-description as an apostle by God's command and by Jesus Christ. Throughout the letter, Paul instructed Timothy to command (parangellō, also translated "charge," "urge," "instruct") the church regarding certain issues (e.g., 1:3; 4:11; 5:7; 6:13, 17) and wanted him—and the church as well (see 1 Timothy: Introduction)—to remember that Paul himself was under divine orders. The descriptions of God as "our Savior" and of Jesus as "our hope" (1:1) also establish the theological horizon of the letter. Paul emphasized both the salvation (1:15; 2:3–6; 4:10) and the hope provided through and embodied in Jesus (4:10; 5:5; 6:17; cf. Col. 1:27). So, salvation is not obtained not through knowledge (1 Tim. 6:20) or asceticism (4:1–3) but from God; hope is based not on human effort or on riches but on God (4:10; 6:17). The themes of salvation and hope encompass the past of Jesus's incarnation and death and His Second Coming. Timothy was Paul's "true son in the faith" (1:2). This not only expresses Paul's close and affectionate relationship to Timothy (cf. Phil. 2:19–20; 2 Tim. 1:2) but also illustrates the kind of relationships that should pervade the church (1 Tim. 5:1–2).

1:3–7. Timothy's Charge. Paul left Timothy in charge of the church at Ephesus with the specific task of addressing false teachings. Timothy was sent on similar missions to the Macedonian churches (Acts 18:5; 19:22), Thessalonica (1 Thess. 3:2), Philippi (Phil. 2:19), and Corinth (1 Cor. 4:17; 16:10–11) and appears as a co-sender on six of Paul's letters (2 Corinthians, Philippians, Colossians, 1 Thessalonians, 2 Thessalonians, Philemon). He may have been young, but he was not a novice.

Paul contrasted the work of the false teachers with his command to Timothy. False teachers were paying attention to myths or fables and "endless genealogies" (1 Tim. 1:4). The Greek verb prosechō ("pay close attention") may imply devotion and even attachment. They were addicted to that which was exciting and controversial. It is not clear what these pursuits were, but they seem to have been religious speculations without any basis in the Christian message and in conflict with it. In their ambition to be considered teachers of the law, these individuals had tried to create a name and a following for themselves by devotion to novel and probably obscure ideas. Paul was not castigating their ambition (cf. 3:1; 1 Cor. 12:28–31) but contrasting their teachings to the gospel entrusted to Timothy (1 Tim. 1:12–20). While their teachings were complex and "endless" (1:4, 7; cf. 2 Tim. 3:7), the gospel is simple and easily summarized (1 Tim. 1:15; 3:16). Their teachings were speculative, produced conflict, brought attention to the human teacher, and were divisive. The gospel produces love (1:5) and focuses on God.

Paul suggests that the opposite and better approach is to focus on oikonomian theou (v. 4).

This has been translated in various ways. Most likely it refers to the way God manages or orders His household (cf. 3:15). Paul considered his commission to be that of a steward of God's household (Col. 1:24–25). Thus, Paul charged Timothy with the task of steering the interests of believers away from the preoccupations of the false teachers to the "way God orders things." This order is specifically grounded in the gospel of salvation. Paul constantly refers to the plan of salvation to solve difficult issues in the church. This focus on God's plan produces love (1 Tim. 1:5) and is inherently unifying.

For Paul, sound teaching goes beyond knowledge to the transformation of the inner being. While sound teachers have love "from a pure heart," from "a good conscience," and from "sincere faith" (v. 5), false teachers have departed from and turned away from these virtues (vv. 6–7; cf. 2 Tim. 3:1–7). Theological fallacies reveal a spiritual problem. Spiritual failure produces vain discussion (1 Tim. 1:6).

1:8–11. The Appropriate Use of the Law. Paul deals first with the misunderstanding of the nature and function of the law by the false teachers. This seems to have been the root of their problem. We know, Paul says, that "the law is good" (v. 8). It is good because it expresses God's will for us so that we may have abundant life (Is. 48:18; Matt. 19:17; Rom. 7:10). It is a guide for the Christian life, but it cannot solve the problem of fallen humanity. The law describes how the righteous should live, not how the sinner can be made righteous (Rom. 3:20–28; Gal. 2:16). It cannot produce the "pure heart," "good conscience," and "sincere faith" mentioned above in 1 Timothy 1:5. It is a standard, not a solution. The law is properly used only in connection to Christ as the One who can make us righteous (1:12–15; cf. Gal. 3:24). False teachers failed to grasp this and misused the law. Their obsession with speculations led them to oppose marriage and certain kinds of foods (1 Tim. 4:3) and to advocate some forms of physical asceticism (cf. 4: 8). Instead of being an instrument for good, the law diverted attention from Christ and became an instrument of oppression.

The law is not made for the righteous person in the sense that it is made not to oppose the upright but to oppose lawless and rebellious people (1:8–9). The law is against what is bad and evil. This is the condemnatory role of the law as contrasted to its positive role as a guide for the Christian life. Paul proceeds to enumerate vices that are against the law (vv. 9–10). The list seems to be ordered according to the Decalogue. Paul refers to persons without respect for moral norms. The first four terms bring to mind the first four commandments. The reference to those who murder their parents reminds us of the fifth commandment. The next three terms refer to murderers, the sexually immoral, and those engaging in homosexual activity (arsenokoitēs designates a male who has sex with another male); these are suggestive of the sixth and the seventh commandments. The last three terms (referring to those who kidnap or enslave, liars, and perjurers) close the list with references to the eighth, ninth, and tenth commandments (since coveting speaks to the motivation behind a kidnapping).

1:12–17. Paul's Life and the Power of Grace. Paul's experience provided evidence the false teachers had ignored: that the real power for righteousness comes through divine grace. In the final analysis, what enables a person to serve God or to teach the law is the personal experience of His grace.

Even though Paul was a teacher as well as a blameless observer and defender of the law (Acts 6:13–15; 8:1–3; Phil. 3:5–6), he had not always loved with "a pure heart," from a "good conscience," and from "sincere faith" that characterizes the gospel and is the essence of the fulfillment of the law (1 Tim. 1:5; Rom. 13:8–10). He identified himself as one of the unrighteous described in 1 Timothy 1:8–10: a blasphemer, a persecutor, and an insolently violent man (v. 13). What empowered Paul to be righteous was the abundant, outflowing "grace of our Lord" (v. 14; cf. Rom. 5:20; 2 Cor. 4:15) along with the "faith and love," which are in Christ Jesus (v. 14). They are the goals of the commandment entrusted to Timothy but ignored by false teachers (1 Tim. 1:5–6; cf. Gal. 5:6). So, grace accomplished what the law could not.

Paul gives two reasons for the mercy shown to him. First, he acted with ignorance in unbelief (1 Tim. 1:13). This does not mean that only sins committed in ignorance are eligible for forgiveness. What limits forgiveness is not God's provision but our willingness to receive it. Second, Paul received God's mercy in order for Christ to display it through his story (v. 16). Paul was to become an example of those who would believe in Christ. He was God's exhibit in the courtroom of human opinion—that God is able to save to the uttermost. If Paul, the worst of sinners (v. 15), was shown mercy (1 Cor. 15:9–10; Gal. 1:13–17), then all would be.

1:18–20. Timothy's Charge Concluded. Paul concludes his introductory exhortation—begun in v. 3—by reminding Timothy of the importance of being faithful to the task entrusted to him through "prophecies" (v. 18). It is not clear what these prophecies said, or if they were made in connection to the specific task at Ephesus or in connection to Timothy's general commission to the gospel ministry (Acts 16:1–3). It seems clear, however, that at some point the Holy Spirit directed elders to commission Timothy for the work of the gospel (1 Tim. 4:14), just as Paul had been (Acts 13:1–3).

Timothy needed to keep those prophecies in mind so that he might fight the battle of life in the way he should (1 Tim. 1:18). They were to keep him focused and to remind him of the sacredness of his task. This task was like waging a war, and he needed to keep "faith and a good conscience" (v. 19)—which is, in fact, the purpose of the command entrusted to him (v. 5)—so as not to experience spiritual death, expressed as suffering "shipwreck" (v. 19). It was necessary that he not only remind the churches of the gospel but also experience it as an example to the believers (4:12; cf. 1 Cor. 4:16–17). In contrast, "Hymenaeus and Alexander" (v. 20; cf. Acts 19:33–34; 2 Tim. 2:17–18; 4:14) violated their consciences and apostatized. Paul gave them over to Satan. This action refers to their exclusion from the community of believers as a disciplinary measure (1 Cor. 5:5; cf. Job 2:6). Paul hoped, however, that they would be taught not to blaspheme, as he himself had learned (1 Tim. 1:13).

Dealing with Improper Conduct in the Church

In this chapter, Paul provided Timothy with practical counsel on dealing with the problems that had arisen in Ephesus. Since many in the church had lost sight of the gospel, Paul reminded them that prayer is a fundamental aspect of what it means to be Christian. He urged them to pray for all people (vv. 1–7). This epistle then addresses the behavior of both men (v. 8) and women (vv. 9–15). More time was needed on counseling women because the false teachers were trying to use them to propagate their own teachings.

2:1–7. Prayers for Humanity and Authorities. Paul's first instruction to the believers in Ephesus was to pray for all people, kings, and those in authority (vv. 1–2). The emphasis on praying for "all" people ("all" is repeated in vv. 1, 2, 4, and 6) not only focused attention on the universal mission of the church but also served as a rebuke to the exclusivist mentality of the false teachers. Prayer affirms that God is the source of all human authority (Rom. 13:1–7; cf. Ezra 6:8–10; 1 Pet. 2:13–14). Prayers were to be offered so that the believers might have peace and quiet (freedom from controversies; 1 Tim. 2:2), enabling them to more easily focus on accomplishing the mission of the church (cf. v. 7). This passage, then, is not primarily about the believers' personal security but about the fulfillment of the church's mission.

In this society, Paul enjoined believers to live in eusebeia and semnotēs (the Greek terms at the end of v. 2). The first term, eusebeia, denotes a deep connection between the knowledge of God and personal conduct. It expresses the OT idea of the "fear of God." The second term refers to behavior considered worthy of respect by others: "respectability." Paul wanted the believers to be respectable and to mirror their faith in their behavior (cf. 3:2–12). He feared that incongruous behavior would obstruct the advance of the gospel.

In the NT, prayer, praise, and thanksgiving are "spiritual sacrifices" acceptable to God (Heb. 13:15–16; 1 Pet. 2:5, 9). Paul here identifies prayers for others (1 Tim. 2:1–2) as something that pleases God (v. 3) and thus an appropriate part of Christian worship. In the OT, God accepted the sacrifices and rituals of honest-hearted worshipers; now, He accepts prayers as spiritual sacrifices. A deeper theological motivation for such prayers is the divine will to save: God, being the God of all, desires that all people be saved and come to know the truth (v. 4). Besides, the fact that "there is one God" (v. 5; cf. Deut. 6:4; 1 Cor. 8:6) means that there is one source of salvation for all (cf. Rom. 3:21–31; 11:26–32). Finally, there is only one Mediator—one way of salvation available to all people—in the person of Jesus Christ (1 Tim. 2:5). It is indeed good to pray for all to our God through our Mediator. Paul expands on the mediatorial role of Jesus by describing Him as the One who gave Himself as "a ransom for all" (v. 6; cf. Mark 10:45). He paid our ransom by giving His life as a substitute. Paul then indicates that Jesus came as the witness from God at the appropriate time, in accordance with God's plan (1 Tim. 2:6; cf. Heb. 1:1–2). Jesus as our Mediator does not mean that God is our adversary but that both Jesus and God work together for our salvation (see 1 Tim. 2:3–4).

2:8–15. Men and Women in Worship. Paul introduces this section with the conjunctive adverb "therefore," indicating that it is related to the previous section. In vv. 1–7, Paul noted that righteous and respectable behavior was necessary when praying for all. In this section (vv. 8–15), Paul unpacks what that means in relation to the participation of men and women in church: men should be temperate and women modest to avoid any reproach against the gospel (cf. 5:14).

Male believers are to lift up "holy hands" as they pray (2:8). Sanctuary regulations required priests to wash their hands before ministering to the Lord (Ex. 30:19–21). Similarly, Paul indicates that acceptable worship demands spiritual purity (cf. Matt. 15:18–20). Believers should abstain from anger and doubting or disputing (1 Tim. 2:8; cf. Matt. 5:23–24). Context suggests that the meaning here at least includes "disputes" or "controversies" (one of the connotations of the Greek word dialogismos), referring to the disputes that the false teachers raised in the church (1 Tim. 1:4; 6:4; cf. 2 Tim. 2:23; Titus 3:9).

Following the same train of thought (the Greek has hōsautōs [1 Tim. 2:9], which connotes "also" or "in the same way"), Paul instructed female believers regarding their personal adornment (1 Tim. 2:9–10) and attitude (vv. 9–15). Women should wear modest clothing, which he defines in relation to both internal and external aspects. On the internal side are propriety and sōphrosynē (v. 9). This important second term refers to the supreme virtue of Greek women. It conveys the idea of prudence and self-control. Paul refers to this virtue at the beginning (v. 9) and at the end (v. 15) of his instruction to women, indicating the important role it plays in the paragraph. On the external side, Paul excludes the use of elaborate braided hairstyles, gold, pearls, and expensive clothing and encourages good works. Roman culture assigned much importance to the way women dressed. There were laws regulating the dress of married women, adulteresses, and even prostitutes. In practical terms, dress determined—to large extent—public identity. Greco-Roman writers described ideal wives as modest in their demeanor.

Jewelry also played an important role in the Greco-Roman world, and it was directly related to social status and values. The significance of the use of jewelry among Roman women is complex. In general, moralists condemned its use and/or the luxurious aspect of it. Still, the hairstyles and jewelry mentioned by Paul were common among wealthy Roman women and even among prostitutes. While the practice often contradicted the opinion, Roman society considered such hairstyles and jewelry superfluous because, among other reasons, they were unnecessary, unlike clothing. Paul also considered jewelry unnecessary. He rejected the ostentatious display of wealth associated with costly clothing and jewelry. Christians should seek to be clothed with something far better than these things—with doing good (v. 10) and with the inner beauty that is appropriate for both men and women who profess loyalty to God.

Paul brings up another topic related to the work of the false teachers. They had been deceiving some female church members who, according to Paul, were "always learning" but never able to come to "knowledge of the truth" (2 Tim. 3:6–7). Therefore, he specifically instructed women to learn quietly and submissively (1 Tim. 2:11). Instruction had a positive side. Women did not normally enjoy the education that men did. In this sense, the gospel brought equal opportunity of education for men and women in the church. But Paul makes it clear that they should be taught by those appointed to teach and not by false teachers. He goes on to describe how the learning should take place. Women were to be silent and in submission only when being taught. The Greek term hēsychia refers here to the quietness or silence that Paul required and not to absolute silence. In v. 2 he uses the corresponding adjective, hēsychios, to describe the peaceful and quiet demeanor that is to characterize the Christian life. Here, it specifically refers to the respectful disposition needed in order to avoid conflicts (e.g., v. 2; 2 Thess. 3:11–12). The submission Paul refers to is not to the husband but to the teacher offering the instruction. Students were expected to respect their instructors and not to argue with them, particularly if the discussion included elements of the teachings of a false teacher. Paul did not permit a woman to teach or to authentein (from authenteō) a man. The Greek term authenteō is found only here in the NT, and it carries the sense of "domineering." Paul's use of this uncommon term suggests that he was opposing women exercising a domineering attitude that would disrupt the teaching process. These women were not yet ready to teach, and their attempts were resulting in the rejection of the authority of the church-appointed instructor.

The meaning of 1 Timothy 2:13–14 is a matter of disagreement among Bible students. It is probably an illustration used by Paul to clarify what he is saying. It is important to note that Paul is talking about what happened not after the fall but before. We should keep in mind that elsewhere Paul expects women not to be silent in church but to pray and prophesy (1 Cor. 11:5; cf. Titus 2:3–5). He also commends women who had authoritative roles in the church, such as Phoebe (Rom. 16:1–2; cf. 1 Cor. 3:5; 2 Cor 3:6; 6:4; 11:23), Priscilla with her husband (Rom. 16:3; Acts 18:26), and probably Junia and her husband (Rom. 16:7). Elsewhere in Scripture, we find reference to women speaking and having leadership roles (e.g., Judg. 4–5; Joel 2:29; Acts 21:8–9).

Therefore, the point of the illustration is to be connected to the false teachers. Paul mentioned Eve not as an example of a woman who did not submit to her husband but as a woman who was deceived. He simply stated that Adam was created first and then Eve; yet it was Eve, not Adam, who was deceived (1 Tim. 2:13–14). Even though Eve had a companion from the beginning, she was deceived. Why? The implication is that she went after knowledge independent of her companion. They should have stayed together against their common enemy. Paul's point is that women should do the same when facing false teachers in order to preserve unity in the church. Men and women should stay united against the common enemy of the gospel. The women in the church were, like Eve, being deceived by an outsider.

As indicated by the Bible texts, women were probably some of the main propagators of false teachings in the church (1 Tim. 4:7; 5:13–14; cf. 2 Tim 3:6–7). The heresy's aversion to marriage (1 Tim. 4:3) suggests that there were other teachings that were especially attractive to well-to-do Christian wives and widows, tempting them to shun home duties and seek a life of independence and liberation (5:11–15).

Paul's concluding instruction to women affirms that they would be saved in or through childbearing if they would continue in faith, love, and holiness, with self-control or propriety (2:15). This is a difficult passage. It could refer to physical safety in childbearing or to (spiritual) salvation "through" childbearing. It most likely refers to the latter. Affluent Greco-Roman women were often averse to having children because of its impact on their appearance and used preventive methods (including abortion) that put them in physical danger, though Roman moralists often considered children to be the true adornments of a woman. Since the heresy that Paul was opposing denied the value of marriage and thus childbearing (4:3), he may have been arguing about the value of childbearing—that it can indeed cohere with Christian faith. Paul also affirmed that by bearing children and upholding Christian values (2:15), the female members of the church were manifesting the qualities of a virtuous wife in Roman society (cf. 5:14).

Leaders of the Church

Since spiritual leaders play such a significant role in the church, in this section Paul focuses his attention on the selection of those leaders, offering advice regarding the appointment of church elders (vv. 1–7) and then for the selection of deacons (vv. 8–13). The last section (vv. 14–16) provides the theological foundation for church order. It is significant to note that Paul focused not on the duties of church leaders, but on the type of character they were to possess.

3:1–7. The Overseer/Elder. The term episkopē means literally "overseer" or "supervisor" but is sometimes translated "bishop." This individual was to serve as the leader of a congregation, perhaps together with other elders (4:14; see commentary on Phil. 1:1–3). The leadership structure Paul described was like a synagogue, which had a leader, a board of elders, and an officer known as khazzan ("helper"), who carried out practical functions. Leaders were in charge of coordinating the activities of the community, including public prayer, reading and exhortation (1 Tim. 2:1–3; 4:13), charity distributions to widows (5:3–16), hospitality (3:2), and settling disputes (5:19–20; cf. Rom. 12:7–8). The qualities of the overseer included various virtues. They are, essentially, what would be expected from every Christian, but it is especially important that the elders exemplify these virtues. Elders are to have these characteristics because they recommend the elders as faithful or trustworthy (1 Cor. 4:2). So, it is necessary that the elder must be mias gynaikos andra (a one-woman/wife man; 1 Tim. 3:2; cf. 3:12; 5:9; Titus 1:6). This could be understood in several ways, but the context simply suggests marital faithfulness. A church leader must be able to manage his home well (1 Tim. 3:4), evidenced by his children obeying and respecting him. The church is God's household (v. 15), and the elder's inability to manage his own house would indicate a lack of capacity to manage God's household (v. 5). Being "hospitable" and "able to teach" (v. 2) were also important for the early church, whose development and health depended, to a large degree, on sending out and receiving guests and on successfully dealing with false teachings (cf. 3 John).

Other characteristics seek to prevent the dangers of leadership. Elders must be "temperate" (1 Tim. 3:2) and not addicted to alcohol (paroinos, "a drunkard"; v. 3), lest their behavior and judgment be corrupted by pleasure. They are "not violent" and "not quarrelsome" (v. 3), enabling them to promote peace and to avoid pride or envy. They should not be greedy for money (v. 3), so as to avoid corruption by avarice. They must be sober-minded or self-controlled (v. 2), so that their decisions reflect the best of their mind and character. They must not be recent converts (v. 6), because Paul knew that there is always a danger of arrogance in a quick ascent to leadership. In summary, they must be "above reproach" or "blameless," with nothing the devil could use to damage the reputation of the church.

3:8–16. The Deacon. The term deacon (diakonos) means, literally, "servant." Paul required from the deacons qualities similar to those of the elders. The differences serve to identify characteristics especially important in view of their roles. The deacons must be semnos (v. 8), which refers to being respectable and dignified. They should not be double-tongued or insincere (v. 8), since this could create problems in the church by their saying one thing to one person and something different to another. They should also not be greedy (v. 8; cf. 6:5). This was especially important for those who managed charity programs. As in the case of any leader, the deacon's life must be congruent with his professed faith and, therefore, he must be tested first (v. 10; cf. 5:22).

Some translations suggest that 3:11 refers to the wives of the deacons, but this is not clear. It could also refer to women who are deacons. They are introduced using the same term employed for deacons (v. 8; hōsautōs; "likewise"; cf. Rom. 16:1). Their attributes parallel those of the deacons and elders, including demeanor ("respectable"), speech ("not malicious slanderers"), temperance, and faithfulness (v. 11).

3:14–16. Theology and Order. The church order Paul promotes in this epistle is dependent on a proper understanding of the gospel. This means that vv. 14–16 are the theological climax of the letter. The church Paul talked about is the community of believers—not a building. He was interested in how we conduct our lives as members of that community (v. 15). The church is the pillar and grounding foundation of the truth (v. 15), not in the sense that the truth is founded and dependent on the church but in the sense that the church provides sure and unmovable support for it. False teachers were damaging this understanding of the church by claiming that truth resided in them and not in the church. Paul's understanding of the church was directly related to the mystery of godliness (v. 16; cf. v. 9). So, he encapsulated the mystery of the gospel in a beautiful literary construction (cf. Rom. 1:3–4; 16:25–27; 1 Cor. 15:3–7; Phil. 2:6–11; Col. 1:15–20). Six affirmations about Jesus are carefully balanced, both grammatically and conceptually (1 Tim. 3:16). The first refers to Jesus's incarnation (He was revealed in the flesh) and the second to His resurrection (He was justified or vindicated by the Spirit). The key Greek term is edikaiōthē ("justified" or "vindicated"; from dikaioō) and refers here to God's demonstration of Jesus's innocence by the Holy Spirit at the resurrection (cf. Acts 2:22–36; Rom. 1:4). The third affirmation probably refers to Jesus's proclamation of victory before evil powers (He was seen by angels; cf. Eph. 3:9–11; 4:8–10; Col. 2:15; 1 Pet. 3:19) or to the moment when the angelic hosts saw Him coming out of the tomb. The fourth and fifth affirmations refer to His proclamation and acceptance among the nations (He was preached and believed), and the sixth to His exaltation (He was taken up and received in glory). The affirmations contain interplay between heaven and earth. Jesus is manifested and exalted in both realms, giving the gospel's impact cosmic proportions. In this beautiful construction, probably a hymn, Paul reminded the leaders that the church's mission to all the nations corresponds with Jesus's mission to earth as "a ransom for all" (1 Tim. 2:6). If they would remain faithful to the gospel, Jesus's success would be theirs too.

4:1–16

Addressing False Teachings

In this section of his letter, Paul describes the nature of the false teachings (vv. 1–5), and, in response, exhorts Timothy to teach true doctrine and to be an example to all (vv. 6–16).

4:1–5. The False Teachers. The Spirit predicted and warned that in later times some would leave the faith and pay attention to the teachings of deceiving spirits (v. 1; Matt. 24:24–28; Mark 13:22; 2 Pet. 2:1–3; 1 John 4:1–3; cf. 2 Thess. 2:3–4; Rev. 13:1–17). In 1 Timothy 1:4, the expression prosechō ("devote oneself to"), translated here in 4:1 as "giving heed" or "follow," denoted the false teachers' devotion to fables and endless genealogies. In 3:8, it referred to addiction to wine. False teachers had arisen from inside the church and Paul wanted the church to be aware of the demonic origins of their unlawful interpretations of the law (1:3–7). The rebellion against the law of God that will culminate prior to the second advent is already active within the church (cf. 2 Thess. 2:7; 2 Tim. 2:1, 6).

The false teachers were forbidding marriage and commanding abstention from food (4:3). We find a similar combination of false teachings in the Colossian church (Col. 2:20–23). Paul's point was that God created both marriage and food for our benefit and that instead of rejecting them we should receive them with thanksgiving (cf. 1 Cor. 10:25–33). In this sense, the false teachers had fallen into the same mistake as the ungodly, who failed to acknowledge the goodness of creation and give thanks to God and who finally corrupted His gifts (Rom. 1:18–32).

The problem was not related to the distinction between clean and unclean foods. The false teachers were prohibiting what God created to be received with thanksgiving (1 Tim. 4:3); they were opposed to God's instruction about what should be eaten (this included clean animals; Lev. 11). They had gone beyond Scripture, making an unlawful use of the law (cf. 1 Tim. 1:8). Paul presented the positive side by stating that the food God created was good (v. 4). We can eat of it using what the Bible teaches about diet ("the word of God"; v. 5) as our criterion and by offering a prayer of thanksgiving.

4:6–11. Exhortation to Teach. If Timothy would instruct the people in this way, he would be a good minister of Jesus Christ (v. 6). The word for "minister" is literally "deacon" (diakonos; "servant"; cf. 3:8, 12), one who ministers to others. Timothy was to give an example (v. 12) that church leaders could follow. He was to be nourished in the words of faith and good doctrine (vv. 13–16), as opposed to the doctrines of demons (v. 1). This is much more important than discussions about mythoi ("fables" or "myths"; v. 7). Creating an athletic image was common in Paul's time (e.g., Heb. 12:1, 11; cf. Acts 20:24; 1 Cor. 9:24; 2 Tim. 4:7). In 1 Tim. 4:8, he affirms that physical exercise is good but what is truly valuable is godliness. Godliness is profitable because it impacts the present life and the future one as well (v. 8). In v. 10, some manuscripts read oneidizometha ("we suffer reproach"), but others read agōnizometha ("we struggle" or "we contend for a prize"). If the latter reading is accurate, Paul may have intended to continue the athletic imagery. The agōn was an athletic contest—traditionally a race or a wrestling competition. Paul considered all his toil and struggle for being found faithful to God worth the effort because God is the Savior of all people, especially of those who believe (v. 10). Paul was not teaching universalism, the idea that at the end God will save everyone. He affirmed that God is the only way of salvation (2:3–4).

4:12–16. Exhortation to be an Example. Paul instructed Timothy—and the church that overhears—to not let anyone think less of him because of his youth. His instructions elsewhere suggest that Timothy had a mild and yielding disposition (1 Cor. 16:10–11; 2 Tim. 4:1–4). He reminded Timothy that authority to lead comes from the power of example. Timothy was to be a model in word and conduct (1 Tim. 4:12). These are intimately connected. Jesus said that speech reveals what is in the heart (Matt. 15:18–19). So, the one who does not speak wrongly is a perfect man (James 3:2). Timothy was also to be an example in purity. In the moral literature of the time, this term often referred to sexual purity (see 1 Tim. 5:2).

The apostle counseled Timothy to devote his attention (4:13; cf. 1:4; 3:8; 4:1) to the work of a minister that consists of reading Scripture, preaching/exhortation, and teaching/doctrine. The context suggests that Paul meant the reading of Scripture in worship, as it was customary in the synagogue (Neh. 8:1–8; Acts 13:15; 15:21). The reference to preaching, or exhortation, probably refers to the sermon that came after the reading of Scripture (Acts 13:15; cf. Rom. 12:8; Heb. 13:22). The "teaching" or "doctrine" (1 Tim. 4:13) referred to comes from the Greek word didaskalia. In short, Timothy was not to neglect his gift (v. 14). This "gift" refers to the ministry Timothy received from God through prophecy and was recognized by the church through the elders laying their hands on him (cf. 2 Tim. 1:6). This ministry, like that of Paul and others, was, in fact, a gift from God to the church for the common good and edification (Rom. 12:6; 1 Cor. 12; Eph. 4:11–16). Note that Paul's commission had come by prophecy as well and was also confirmed by the laying on of hands (Acts 13:1–3). The elders referenced here were perhaps a leadership board in each church, corresponding to the gerousia ("eldership") of the synagogue and the presbyterion ("eldership") of the Greco-Roman collegium or association. Paul does not make clear if this happened at the beginning of Timothy's ministry or at a later time (1 Tim. 1:18; Acts 16:1–2).

Timothy needed to take care of his ministry. If he guarded his behavior and focused on the work required of him, he would save not only himself but also those who heard him (1 Tim. 4:16).

5:1—6:2a

Relationships in the Church

In this portion of the letter, Paul instructed Timothy on how to deal with different groups in the church. It begins by depicting the church as a family (vv. 1–2), followed by a long instruction about widows (vv. 3–16). Finally, Paul counseled Timothy on how to treat church elders (vv. 17–25) and on matters related to slavery (6:1–2).

5:1–2. The Church as a Family. The model of the church used here by Paul is not patriarchal or matriarchal but that of a family in which all relate to each other on the basis of mutual respect. Timothy was not to humiliate older members but to exhort them (v. 1). Younger ones he should treat as brothers and sisters and older women as mothers (v. 2).

The Laying on of Hands

The laying on of hands refers to several things in Scripture. In the OT sacrifices, the gesture indicated the offerer's identity with the sacrifice and the giving or dedication of the sacrifice to God (e.g., Ex. 29:10; Lev. 4:15; 8:14; see "The Laying On of Hands," p. 243). Thus, the laying on of hands during the consecration of the priests may have referred to the people's dedication of the priest to God for His service (Num. 8:10–11). On other occasions, the gesture could indicate who or what the focus of the ritual or action was (e.g., Lev. 24:14) and was used for the appointment of Joshua as successor of Moses (Num. 27:18; Deut. 34:9). In the NT, the gesture is used in healings (Mark 7:32; 10:16; Acts 9:12–17), blessings (Mark 10:13–16), baptism with the Holy Spirit (Acts 8:16–19), and the appointments of elders or other leaders (Acts 14:23; 2 Tim. 1:6).

5:3–16. Widows and Their Financial Support. This is the longest and most complex of Paul's instructions in the letter. Widows and orphans were especially vulnerable and often chronically poor. In the OT, God is described as a protector of the widow and the orphan (Ex. 22:21–27; Ps. 146:9; Prov. 15:25) who issued legislation to provide relief for them (e.g., Deut. 14:28–29; 16:11–14; 24:19–22). Jewish synagogues administered a relief system for the poor, and the early church shared their possessions for the common benefit (Acts 2:44–45; 4:32–35). The administration of a relief system, however, posed challenges (cf. Acts 6:1–7). The instructions of Paul in this passage address the question of who should receive financial help in the church.

Paul instructed Timothy to give appropriate help to those who were truly widows (1 Tim. 5:3). The Greek verb timaō ("to honor") often took the specific form of financial support, as it was implied in the commandment to "honor" parents (vv. 3–4; Ex. 20:12; cf. Matt. 15:4–6). The biblical support Paul gives later for the instruction to give "double honor" to elders who govern well makes clear that, in this passage, "honoring" implies financial support (1 Tim. 5:17–18). Paul draws a stark contrast between the "real widows" (vv. 4–5, 9–10) who should receive support, and widows (vv. 6, 11, 13, 15) who should not. They are described in terms of their socio-economic and spiritual situation and age. Real widows were those with no children or grandchildren—those left alone (vv. 4–5). Widows with children should be supported by them in order not to burden the church (v. 16). Paul considered this a matter of religious duty (v. 8; cf. James 1:27). Both the fifth commandment and God's own concern for the widow and the orphan demanded that believers care for them. Furthermore, Greco-Roman law required that children care for their parents in old age. Thus, Christians who neglected their own parents were worse than an unbeliever (1 Tim. 5:8).

Real widows (those over sixty years of age; v. 9) could not support themselves and were unlikely to marry again. Paul identifies such a widow as above reproach (v. 7), the same quality Paul required from the elder and from Timothy (3:2; 6:14), and as putting her trust and hope in God (5:5; the ideal for the whole community; e.g., 4:10; cf. Pss. 7:1; 16:1; 31:1; 37:3). Paul identified her as having been a faithful spouse (1 Tim. 3:2, 12; 5:9) and finally as having a reputation for doing good (5:10). The author mentions hospitality (e.g., washing believers' feet), relief efforts, and that she had raised children (cf. 2:15).

"False widows," on the other hand, are described as a threat to the spiritual health of the church and to its reputation. Some of them were living for pleasure (Gr. spatalaō) and were spiritually dead (5:6; cf. Rev. 18:7–9). The Greek term spatalaō refers to a life of luxury with immoral overtones and was used to describe life in Sodom (Ezek. 16:49, LXX; cf. James 5:5). Another problem was their sensual desires causing them to become separated (Gr. katastrēniaō) from Christ (1 Tim. 5:11). The Greek verb katastrēniaō denotes being dominated by strong physical desire (often sexual). Paul argued that these sensual desires were pitting them against Christ, occasioning their desire to marry. Marriage was not the problem, since Paul himself required younger widows to remarry (v. 14; cf. 1 Cor. 7:8–9, 39). But Paul condemned marriage with unbelievers, which would lead widows to abandon their commitment to Christ, since wives typically adopted the religion of their husbands (1 Cor. 7:39). Paul also worried that financial support given to "false widows" would encourage them to go from house to house speaking inappropriate things (1 Tim. 5:13). Gossip was probably not the only concern. Women were favored targets of false teachers (4:7; 2 Tim. 3:6–7), and their idleness would be especially dangerous for the church.

Paul was instructing Timothy to do two things: First, he should refuse the younger widows (1 Tim. 5:11). Paul probably meant more than not including them in the financial relief roster, but also staying away from them (see 4:7; 2 Tim. 2:23; Titus 3:10). The advice may seem harsh, but specific concerns may have motivated Paul. There was a sexual revolution occurring in the Greco-Roman world at the time of Paul. Prominent and affluent women claimed the sexual liberty normally permitted to men. Young widows were especially vulnerable to this tendency, since their legal situation freed them from the restrictions of marriage, and were often the butt of jokes about sexual indiscretion. Rome, in fact, tried to reduce promiscuity by issuing legislation against adultery (committed by married women) and sex with unmarried people (committed by men, widows, and free women).

The second instruction was that younger widows should marry, bear children, and manage their homes (1 Tim. 5:14). This was the Greco-Roman ideal for honorable women. In fact, Roman law penalized widows between twenty and fifty years of age who did not remarry and have children.

Paul wanted only widows who were alone, were unable to sustain themselves, and had a good reputation to be included in the church's relief system. His concern went beyond the finances of the church to its spiritual health and reputation. The church should give no opportunity for an adversary of the church to slander it (v. 14).

5:17–25. Relationship with Elders. Paul advised Timothy that good leaders should receive double honor. He referred especially to those who preach and teach doctrines from the word (v. 17). This was especially valuable in view of the false teachers who threatened the integrity of the church (1:3–4). Paul quoted two passages from Scripture that suggest that "double honor" refers to material compensation, as in the case of the widows. The first passage (Deut. 25:4) prohibits muzzling an ox while it treads out the grain (see 1 Cor. 9:9). The second passage is Jesus's teaching in Luke 10:7, stating that the worker is worthy of his wages. It is significant that at this early stage Paul considered Jesus's teachings as Scripture.

Paul also advised Timothy not to receive an accusation against a leader unless backed by the testimony of two or three witnesses (1 Tim. 5:19). Timothy was to follow the criteria used for dealing with accusations in the OT—which the early church also followed (Deut. 19:15–20; cf. Matt. 18:15–20; 2 Cor. 13:1)—and rebuke in the presence of all those who were sinning (1 Tim. 5:20). This does not contradict Jesus's advice that public discipline should come only after two private warnings (Matt. 18:15–20). Paul himself instructed Titus to reject a person only after a first and second warning (Titus 3:10). The expression used with regard to the elders sinning normally indicates a continuous action and may imply a person who persists in his behavior after being warned. The general purpose of the public rebuke was that the rest might also fear (cf. Deut. 19:20). It refers to the OT concept of the "fear of God" that prevents a person from sinning. The Greek term elenchō ("rebuke") could imply a range of different disciplinary measures: exposure and convincing of wrongdoing, correction, censure, or discipline. The public rebuke could be accomplished by any of these, depending on the particular situation.

Paul reminded Timothy of the importance of this task. Paul may have feared that Timothy's yielding disposition would lead him to shun the important but difficult task of reproving sin (see 1 Tim. 4:12). So, Paul charged Timothy before the heavenly court to perform this duty without prejudice or partiality (5:21; cf. 2 Tim. 2:14; 4:1). He was not to prejudge cases or proceed with favoritism. Neither was he to appoint leaders (laying hands on them) without careful consideration (1 Tim. 5:22). Paul implied that Timothy would share in other people's sins if, because of negligence, he appointed a leader who was in sin or allowed a leader who was in sin to continue in his position. Timothy should keep himself pure because his authority to deal with the crisis at Ephesus depended on that.

Paul also advised Timothy to use a little wine because of his stomach and frequent ailments (v. 23). This is a medicinal use of wine. It is not clear how this advice relates to the rest of the paragraph. It is possible that it was necessary because of Timothy's concern about keeping himself pure. (Nazirites, for example, drank neither fermented nor unfermented wine [Num. 6:1–9; cf. Acts 21:23–24].) It is clear that Timothy's custom was to drink only water. The Greek term oinos ("wine") could designate either fermented or unfermented wine. Both Aristotle (384–322 B.C.) and Pliny (A.D. 24–79) commented explicitly that unfermented wine was used for stomach problems.

Paul finished the section with a reminder to Timothy that in some cases it is difficult to identify sin in the church. Sometimes sins are obvious, but Timothy should be certain that his judgment would confirm God's judgment (1 Tim. 5:24; cf. Matt. 18:15–20). In other cases, facts would become clear only later. Timothy should not worry, though. God, in the end, would judge the hidden things (Eccl. 12:14; Luke 12:2; Heb. 4:13).

6:1–2a. Masters and Slaves. Paul finished his instruction regarding relationships in the church by addressing the relationship between slaves and masters. Some slaves despised their masters, especially Christian masters. This attitude probably originated from Paul's own teaching that in Christ "there is neither slave nor free" (Gal. 3:28; cf. 1 Cor. 12:13; Eph. 6:8; Col. 3:11). Paul did not attempt, however, to overturn the existing social order. He understood its wickedness (cf. 1 Cor. 7:21), but his priority was that God and the gospel might not be slandered (1 Tim. 6:1). Yet, he did undermine it in a subtle and foundational way. He described the service of Christian slaves as a "benefaction" to their Christian masters. In ancient society, only patrons could exercise benefaction that made them worthy of honor. Paul reversed the language of honor—just as Jesus did (Luke 22:25–27)—and described the slave as the benefactor who serves from a position of honor and strength. Thus, the master became a beloved fellow believer (1 Tim. 6:2a).

Conclusion

Paul closed his letter to Timothy by recapitulating the main instructions at the beginning of the letter. Timothy was to confront false teachers through both teaching and behavior. Paul dealt first with the false teachings and the character of the teachers (6:2b–10), then again counseled Timothy to model true teaching (vv. 11–21).

6:2b–10. False Teachings, Godliness, and Greed. Paul had charged Timothy at the beginning of the letter to confront false teachers and their misunderstanding of the law (1:3–20). In this section (6:2b–10), Paul charged him to confront them on their misunderstanding of godliness. Verse 2b points to what was said before and to what is going to be said. Verses 3 to 5 describe false teachers in terms of the content of their teaching as well as their character. False teachers distorted what Paul had presented. They rejected the teachings of the Lord Jesus Christ, and their teaching did not produce godliness (v. 3). By the latter, Paul referred to a life in which faith in God is congruent with behavior. The history of the false teachers' character followed a downward path. Everything began with a state of pride that blinded them so that they ended up knowing nothing. Pride and ignorance produce a state of spiritual sickness characterized by conflict, envy, and strife. The end of the process is a corrupted mind, devoid of the truth (v. 5; cf. Rom. 1:18–32). The false teachers had become incapable of understanding the truth, believing that godliness was a means of gaining riches. Their apparent godliness was for financial profit. Timothy should withdraw from such.

Paul conceded that godliness is in fact a "great gain" when characterized by "contentment" (1 Tim. 6:6–8). The concept of autarkeia ("contentment," "self-sufficiency") was an important virtue in Greco-Roman philosophy. Paul and Jesus, however, understood it not as a discipline, but as an outgrowth of faith in God's loving care (Matt. 6:25–34; Luke 12:22–32; Phil. 4:11–12). Those who desire to be rich face many dangers. Desire makes a person vulnerable to temptation. Ironically, those who fall into it are trapped by many other foolish and harmful desires as well (1 Tim. 6:9). They are foolish because they ignore God's knowledge and purposes and are harmful because they lead to total destruction. The love of money is a powerful, blinding force (v. 10). It first makes people abandon the faith and secondly, leads them to impale themselves with many sorrows (v. 10).

6:11–21. Final Instruction to Timothy. Paul's instructions to Timothy (vv. 11–16), with their description of Jesus's confession (v. 13) and God's nature (vv. 15–16), provide the rhetorical basis on which exhortation to the rich is to be built (vv. 17–19) and on which a final exhortation is offered (vv. 20–21). Paul commanded Timothy to model the true life of faith, which others—including the rich—should have. Timothy was to lead by example, but he himself needed to follow the example of Jesus and God.

Paul described Timothy as a "man of God" (v. 11; see Deut. 33:1; 1 Sam. 9:6; 1 Kin. 13:1; 17:18; 2 Chr. 8:14). As such, Timothy was to "flee" the evil ways of the false teachers (1 Tim. 6:3–10). He should, instead, pursue righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience/endurance, and gentleness. This list of virtues contrasts the vices of the false teachers, characterized by envy, strife, and reviling (vv. 4–5). The last in the virtue list—sometimes translated as "meekness" or "gentleness"—is a rare term (praupatheia) and denotes a quality especially appropriate in view of the contentious spirit of the false teachers. Timothy was to fight the good fight of faith—focused on the final goal of eternal life and anchored in the remembrance of a pivotal moment of his own story: his good confession in the presence of many witnesses (v. 12). Paul could have been referring to the moment Timothy was commissioned for the work of the gospel (4:14) or, more likely, his baptism. Paul did not describe the content of such a confession, but the fact that Jesus Himself gave it before Pontius Pilate (6:13; John 18:36–38) suggests that it consisted in avowing Jesus as both Christ (Messiah) and Lord (cf. Rom. 10:9–10).

Paul urged Timothy, in light of God's purview (1 Tim. 6:13), to keep this commandment purely (v. 14), referring to all the instructions contained in the letter (cf. 1:3–7). Paul reminded Timothy of his accountability to God. Paul invited him for a second time to imagine himself called before the heavenly court (cf. 5:21; 2 Tim. 4:1), reminding him to keep the instructions of the letter until the appearing of Christ, the Christian hope. Then the truth of the Christian confession would be irrefutably clear to all. Augustus was often celebrated as "savior" of the world. His "appearance" had brought hope to humankind and marked the beginning of "good tidings." Paul confessed, however, that the only "appearance" that brought true hope and good news was Jesus's Second Coming. This will be brought about by God, who is the only dynastēs ("Ruler," "Sovereign," "Potentate"). God is superior to anyone else in terms of position and nature. In terms of position, He is "King of kings and Lord of lords." These titles also belong to Jesus (Rev. 17:14; 19:16). In terms of nature, God alone has immortality (1 Tim. 6:16), a quality often attributed to Jesus (John 5:25; 10:15–18; 13:8), while believers will receive immortality as a gift from God (1 Cor. 15:53–54).

The doxology of 1 Timothy 6:15b–16 (cf. 1:17) is intimately related to the instruction to rich people that follows (6:17–19). Paul commanded the rich to not be proud (v. 17). Wealth provides power to its possessor and attracts flattery; it is a constant source of temptation. The wealthy should not trust in the uncertainty of wealth. People are often tempted to think that real life can be found in pleasure, possessions, and power, but God is the only One who can give life. The contrast here between the unreliability of riches and the trustworthiness of God is the same as between idols and God in the OT (e.g., Jer. 10:8–10). God is the only One who has life in Himself and is, therefore, the Life Giver for all (1 Tim. 6:13) and the One who "richly" provides for us (v. 17; cf. James 1:5). Once we understand that material possessions are a gift from God, we are ready to relate to them wisely. As gifts, whatever power they may have depends on God. They offer no life in themselves. If their pursuit separates us from God, both they and we will perish. The rich should, instead, be rich in doing good (1 Tim. 6:18). Those who share their riches in this life store them for the future; those who are ready to give generously are truly grasping eternal life (v. 19).

Paul concluded his charge to Timothy by summarizing his instruction to engage the opponents (vv. 20–21; cf. 1:3–20). While there are instructions in the letter that may not appear to be related to the heresy, Paul's conclusion suggests that the letter should be read in that context. False teachings are described as "falsely called knowledge" (6:20). It is possible that Paul's opponents liked to call the content of their teachings "knowledge" (cf. 1 Cor. 8:1; 13:2; Col. 1:9–10; 2:3). This reference to "falsely called knowledge" provides a fitting conclusion to the letter. The pursuit of the "falsely called knowledge" by those desiring to be teachers of the law and of riches by those desiring to be rich are similar in nature and outcome. Both are, in the end, false idols that will cause the destruction of those who worship them. Timothy was, instead, to protect what was given into his trust (1 Tim. 6:20), namely, the Christian message. Thus, the epistle comes to an end, reminding us of the presence of false teachings and the need to affirm true Christian teaching as we await Christ's return.

2 TIMOTHY

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. As a personal letter written to Timothy, this epistle did not originally have a title attached to it. When Paul's letters were gathered together into a collection, early scribes entitled it pros timotheon b ("To Timothy 2"). The title was later expanded, identifying it as "the Second Epistle to Timothy," with later manuscripts also listing "holy" or "apostle" Paul (and in some cases "the holy apostle Paul") as the author.

This epistle is Paul's second letter to his faithful younger colleague, Timothy (1:1, 2). The first verse of the epistle states that Paul is the author and, unlike most of his other letters, has no reference to a colleague helping him write it. As is the case in 1 Timothy and Titus, differences in language, vocabulary, themes, and style—in comparison to Paul's other letters—have led critical scholars to question whether or not the apostle was its real author. While these differences are certainly present, they need not undermine Pauline authorship. They are most likely the result of the particular circumstances in Paul's life as well as the unique situations he was confronting in each of these letters, including his probable use of an amanuensis in the writing process (Rom. 16:22). Early Christian writers unanimously attest to Paul being the author of the letter.

Date. This epistle is generally believed to have been written from Rome during Paul's second imprisonment. The book of Acts closes with Paul under house arrest in Rome (Acts 28:30) around the year A.D. 62. Although his freedom was restricted during this time, Paul preached the gospel in Rome and wrote four of his epistles: Ephesians (cf. 6:20), Philippians (cf. 1:13, 14), Colossians (cf. 4:18), and Philemon (cf. 1, 9). When finally released two years later, he returned to Greece and Asia Minor and wrote letters to Timothy and Titus. He was later arrested again, taken back to Rome, and executed in A.D. 66 or 67. Second Timothy is the last known document Paul wrote as he awaited execution in the autumn of A.D. 66.

Backgrounds. It is commonly acknowledged that Paul was martyred in Rome during the persecution of Christians by Nero after the great fire of A.D. 64. Although the people of Rome suspected that Nero instigated the fire in order to rebuild a wide section of Rome with new buildings and palaces, he diverted suspicion from himself by accusing the Christians. Though the Bible makes no mention of Nero's persecution, it shapes the immediate historical background of this letter. It was the persecution of countless Christians in Rome that ultimately resulted in the martyrdom of Paul and Peter. Second Timothy is Paul's last letter, written from prison at a time when he was anticipating his own death (4:6). At the time Paul wrote 2 Timothy, he had already stood trial (4:17) but apparently had not yet been sentenced to die. He was alone, except for the companionship of Luke (4:11). Writing to Timothy, Paul urged his younger colleague to come to him "before winter" (4:21) and to bring his cloak and his books, "especially the parchments" he had left in Troas (4:13). Troas may have been where Paul was arrested—leaving behind some of his possessions. Whether Timothy was able to respond to Paul's request is unknown.

Theology and Purpose. This epistle has been called the last will and testament of the apostle. He wrote it personally to Timothy and to the church at Ephesus. Paul had three reasons for writing to Timothy: first, he was lonely and wanted Timothy to join him in Rome; second, he was concerned about the welfare of the churches and admonished Timothy to guard the gospel and, if necessary, suffer for it; and third, indirectly, Paul desired to write to the church at Ephesus through Timothy. His message can be summarized under three main ideas.

1. Hope and Death. Imprisoned in Rome and anticipating his execution, Paul felt isolated and in need of companionship (4:9–11). As he reflected on the nature of his ministry, he did not express feelings of guilt or frustration. He declared with confidence: "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith" (4:7). He was ready to pour out his life as a drink offering; he was at peace (4:6). The source of his strength was the grace of God (2:1), which assured him that if he died with Christ, he would also live with Him (2:11). This is the Christian hope of the resurrection of the dead, which some false teachers in Ephesus were saying had already occurred (in some sense not specifically identified in the text; 2:18) but which was firmly established in the resurrection of Jesus (1:10; 2:8). As in the rest of the NT, in 2 Timothy the Christian hope is exclusively dependent on the salvific work of Christ. At the present time we live in hope, but this hope will be realized only during His epiphany at the Second Coming (4:1)—what Paul calls "that day" and which includes the establishment of God's kingdom (1:12, 18; 4:8). At "that day," God will also judge the living and the dead (4:1). Paul's hope includes the reward that God will grant His servants on "that day." He defined it as "the crown of righteousness," which could refer to the vindication of God's followers in the final judgment (4:8). Hope is an eschatological expectation that impacts the present. It gave Paul the strength not only to suffer in the proclamation of the gospel but also, if necessary, to die for it. The significance of our present life and experiences is determined by the hope of the coming of Christ.

2. Suffering for the Gospel. Suffering for the gospel could be discouraging, particularly for a young minister or a recent convert. In Paul's day, many believed that suffering was a divine indictment against a life of disloyalty to God. Paul often testified that he had suffered much for Christ in the performance of his ministry, but he rejected that popular interpretation (1:8; 2:9). According to him, those who truly serve the Lord will be persecuted (3:12). Therefore no one should be ashamed of those who suffer for the gospel or of their own suffering for it (1:8, 16; see "A Profile of Paul's Ministry," p. 1670). Paul knew that the innocent could also suffer. Jesus suffered, but He endured it, and those who endure suffering for Him will reign with Him (2 Tim. 2:12). Such suffering is not, by nature, good, and therefore God can deliver us from it (3:11; 4:18). Meanwhile, suffering for the gospel may at times provide the opportunity to proclaim the gospel in unexpected places, as it had for Paul in Rome (4:17). What Christians need is perseverance in their faithfulness to the Lord in spite of the suffering they will experience (4:5).

3. The Christian Message. Paul placed significant emphasis on the proclamation of the true gospel. He addressed the matter of false teachers wasting their energy and time in unprofitable discussion on matters of no value to the church (2:14). Others were promoting false teachings not only opposed to the gospel but also resulting in the overturning of the faith of some (2:18). These individuals needed to be confronted with gentleness but firmness (2:24; 3:8), the antidote for such teachings being the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures (3:15–16). Timothy should have been able to accurately handle (that is, correctly teach) the word (2:15) and to remain loyal to the apostolic teaching he received from Paul and through the study of the Scriptures (1:13; 3:10, 14–15). Paul instructed Timothy to entrust the gospel message to other individuals who could, in turn, pass it on to still others (2:2). For Paul, the Christian message was to be taught without distortion because he received it from the Lord. In the fulfillment of the mission of the church, the message we proclaim is what we have received from the Lord through the Scriptures. Any attempt to change it would result in a spreading, deadly disease (2:17). False teaching would become heresy. Safety from heresy is found only in a deep knowledge of the word of God (3:16–17).

COMMENTARY

Introduction

1:1–2. Greeting. Paul began by affirming his apostolic ministry. He was an apostle of Jesus—as he first said—appointed by Him and at His service. Although not one of the original twelve apostles chosen by Jesus, Paul believed his calling to apostleship came directly from Jesus in his encounter with Him on the road to Damascus (Acts 26:12–20; Gal. 1:12). Second, his apostleship was an expression of the will of God for him. This was not something he was seeking to obtain, nor was it the result of human intrigues. God had chosen him for this task. He never forgot this life-changing call to the ministry and often referred back to it as his chief source of courage and conviction when faced with difficulties. Third, Paul also understood his apostleship to be according to the promise of life in Christ (1:1). His work consisted of making known the promise of life that comes to those united to Christ—accessible only through Him. Paul's apostleship was about life in Christ. As he approached the end of his life, his focus was on the promise of eternal life that every believer has in Christ, and also on the new life of righteousness and peace one has in the present life.

The epistle is addressed to Timothy. Paul likely met and shared the gospel with Timothy during his first missionary journey to Lystra and Derbe (Acts 14:6). During his second visit to that area (Acts 16:1), Timothy joined Paul's team of evangelists. Thus, Paul claimed him as a beloved, dear son. Timothy served as Paul's messenger to Corinth (2 Cor. 1:1) and to Thessalonica (1 Thess. 3:2, 6). He must have been with Paul during his first imprisonment in Rome, for he is mentioned as a coauthor of Paul's epistles to the Philippians (Phil. 1:1), to the Colossians (Col. 1:1), and to Philemon (Philem. 1). Later, Timothy ministered in Ephesus (1 Tim. 1:3). At the time of this letter, Timothy was likely in his mid to late thirties. Paul's greeting ends, as usual, with a blessing of grace, mercy, and peace. These blessings express the foundation ("grace," "mercy") and the result ("peace" or reconciliation with God; cf. 2 Cor. 5:17–19) of accepting God's saving work (1:2).

1:3–5. Thankful Memories of Timothy's Faith. Paul considered prayer an essential part of his daily routine and wanted Timothy to know this, no doubt indirectly inviting him to do the same. Paul prayed constantly for Timothy, perhaps to motivate him and his readers to practice intercessory prayer. Such prayers turn our concern from ourselves to the needs of others in true Christian service. Paul followed the example of Jesus, who prayed for His followers (John 17:6–26) and is the Mediator between humanity and the Father (1 Tim. 2:5). Paul and Timothy had apparently formed a tender bond the last time Paul had visited. Paul had been impressed and encouraged by the sincerity of Timothy's relationship with God. His sincere faithfulness to God was, to a large extent, the result of the same faithfulness exemplified and taught to him by his mother and grandmother; Timothy was a third-generation believer. Paul implicitly exhorted him to persevere. Paul's words of encouragement remind us of the value of seeing the good in others instead of seeing only their weaknesses. It is easy to find faults in others, but the power of a kind word, a smile, or a warm embrace provides a boost in spirit and a renewed strength to continue in the good path.

Encouragement to Faithfulness in Ministry

Moving on from Timothy's past experiences, Paul next exhorted him to remain faithful in ministry and to continue his labor for Christ despite hardships. Paul's point of reference is the work of Christ and its impact on the life of the believer (1:9–10; 2:8–13).

1:6–14. Boldness to Endure Suffering. The thanksgiving moves almost imperceptibly into an exhortation. On the basis of Timothy's heritage and faith, Paul first exhorted him to stir up or keep burning the gift of ministry. This means not that the fire was about die out but that it needed to be developed and used in order to keep it aflame (cf. Matt. 25:14–30). This was possible because God has given us a spirit not of fear or timidity but of power that works and love that cares and a sound, disciplined mind to understand and faithfully teach the word of God (2 Tim. 1:7). The giving of the gift is associated with the laying of Paul's hands on Timothy (v. 6; cf. 1 Tim. 4:14). This means not that Timothy did not have the Spirit and the gift previously but that through the laying on of hands, the gift was now officially activated and could be developed for the service of the church. Paul secondly urged Timothy not to be ashamed of the gospel or of Paul in his imprisonment (2 Tim. 1:8). Shame would have led Timothy to distance himself from Paul and his message, denying its efficacy. Instead, Paul invited Timothy to share in his sufferings for the gospel, strengthened by the power of God.

The reference to the gospel caused Paul to review its content. It is, first, God's saving activity, implying at this point what will be explicitly stated, namely, that this is the exclusive work of God. Second, the gospel is also God's activity in calling us to holiness. Third, the saving and the calling are not based on our alleged good works, because before the coming of the gospel we did not have any. Fourth, the gospel is the expression of God's eternal saving purpose, which reaches us through divine grace. This is about His eternal plan for the salvation of sinners. Fifth, it was also established in eternity that saving grace was ours only and exclusively in Christ. He is the eternally appointed channel through which the saving power of the gospel will reach sinners. Sixth, the divine plan of salvation through grace was hidden in God throughout eternity, but it was revealed to us at the first epiphany of Christ: the incarnation, ministry, death, and resurrection. Here, the main emphasis is on His resurrection, through which death was overcome—making life available to all (vv. 8, 10; cf. 2 Cor. 5:12–15, 21). The resurrection of Jesus not only assures us of our own resurrection in the future but also empowers us to live the fullness of life to which God has called us.

Paul affirms that he had been appointed as a preaching herald, apostle, and teacher (2 Tim. 1:11). According to him, the proclamation of the gospel often entails suffering (cf. 2 Cor. 6:4–10), which could be considered dishonorable. But Paul assured Timothy that he was not ashamed of the sufferings he now was enduring, knowing in whom he had believed (2 Tim. 1:12; cf. Rom. 1:16–17). On account of the gospel, Paul was convinced that he could place his entire life in the hands of the Lord. And even though his death was imminent, he was confident that his life would be given back to him on that day when Christ would return in glory. Paul indicated that the gospel makes unashamed service to and suffering for Christ possible. Paul also urged Timothy—and urges us—to keep the pattern of the gospel: the sound words Paul had taught and proclaimed (v. 13) in the apostolic teachings or Christian doctrines. The church has only one message, and the Lord entrusted it to her. Timothy was to proclaim the apostolic teachings in the faith and love found in Jesus, and by the effective power of the Holy Spirit. There is no limit to the usefulness and influence of someone who is consecrated to the will of God and guided by the Holy Spirit.

1:15–18. Examples of Disloyalty and Loyalty. Paul mentioned three examples to illustrate the results of being ashamed or unashamed of the gospel. While in the province of Asia, whose capital was Ephesus, Phygel[l]us and Hermogenes abandoned him. Nothing is known about this incident, but it is possibly related to Paul's final arrest. If so, it is possible that they deserted Paul because they feared for their own lives or were ashamed of his imprisonment. The text does not provide a motive. The household of Onesiphorus, however, stood in contrast as an example of loyalty and willingness to suffer for the gospel. Onesiphorus often refreshed Paul with his care (v. 16). Knowing Paul was in prison in Rome, Onesiphorus searched diligently until he found him (v. 17)—a hazardous and life-threatening endeavor. The chapter ends with Paul, moved by Onesiphorus's loyalty, commending him to God's mercy on the day of judgment (v. 18; cf. Matt. 25:36). This could indicate that Onesiphorus was dead by then and that Paul was anticipating that things would go well for him in the judgment.

2:1–7. Be Strong and Endure Hardship. With these examples in mind, Paul urged Timothy to be strong in the grace of Jesus Christ (v. 1) and to commit the teachings he had heard from Paul (which were also attested by many other witnesses) to faithful persons. These individuals would be able to teach others (v. 2). This passage sets in motion the importance of the reliable transmission of the apostolic message within the Christian church. The apostles trained their colleagues (e.g., Timothy) and entrusted to them the Christian message of salvation in Jesus; they, in turn, were to commit this message to faithful individuals who could teach it to others. In his task of teaching and proclaiming the gospel, Timothy had to be strong and ready to suffer along with Paul, enduring hardship like a good soldier of Jesus Christ (v. 3). In a world of sin and opposition to the gospel, Christians will confront trials and hardship, but they should face them with courage and trust in God's sustaining grace.

Paul illustrates the importance of Christian determination by highlighting the experience of three kinds of individuals: the soldier (vv. 3–4), the athlete (v. 5), and the farmer (v. 6). As a soldier, we need to please the One who called us to service and not become entangled with everyday life to the extent that it distracts us from our purpose. Total dedication to a cause is required, while self-indulgence is to be set aside. The athlete, in order to be crowned in a competition, must compete according to the rules of the event. The emphasis is on self-discipline, manifested in service to God, that will involve hardship. The Christian is also likened to a farmer, who is expected to labor first in order to enjoy the benefits later. This requires patience and endurance. Paul asked Timothy to carefully consider and reflect on these words of instruction, and he prayed that the Lord would give him comprehensive insight and understanding (v. 7). The gift of discernment is indispensable for all believers.

2:8–13. Remember Jesus's Sufferings. Paul closes this section by pointing to the work of Christ and its significance for our Christian life: Christ also suffered—even to death—but was raised from the dead; He is alive! By His death and resurrection, Jesus accomplished redemption for humanity. This is the wonderful, good news for which Paul was willing to suffer. In fact, he was already in chains, as if he were an evildoer or criminal (v. 9). The word of God, however, is not chained. Even though Paul was in prison for his faith, he was still proclaiming the word of God (see Acts 28:30–31). His suffering was worthwhile if, in the end, he could assist the elect (the believers) so that they might obtain the salvation that is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory (2 Tim. 2:10)—to experience the consummation of their salvation at the end. This salvation is available to all only in union with Christ. There is no reason to be fearful or ashamed of the gospel (see 1 Cor. 1:6–7; Eph. 3:13; on election, see "Divine Election," p. 1594).

Paul further developed the implications of the work of Christ for the believer with what looks like a hymn of endurance in the face of suffering. The trustworthy, faithful saying refers to what follows. He set forth four conditional statements, and all four are assumed to be true. The first part of each statement gives the condition and the second part gives the result. Two describe what is expected of believers and two describe what is not. What seems to be emphasized is God's faithfulness, implying that we should also be faithful to our commitment to Him.

The first statement refers to repentance, symbolized by dying to sin—also symbolized in the rite of baptism (see Rom. 6:2–7). As a result of dying, we shall also live with Him. This is both a reference to the new life in Christ (Rom. 6:5–11) and to the promise of eternal life after the resurrection (cf. John 3:16; 14:3). The second statement focuses on the necessity of endurance or perseverance during times of difficulty in the Christian life. Present hardship and suffering are transitory in light of the fact that we will reign with Christ in His kingdom (see 2 Tim. 4:1, 18; Rom. 8:16, 17; Rev. 20:4).

The third and fourth statements refer to unacceptable behavior for believers. If we deny or disown Him (2 Tim. 2:12), He will also deny or disown us in the judgment (cf. Matt. 10:33). The denial here refers to apostasy. Jesus cannot mediate for those who have completely rejected Him as Mediator before the Father (cf. 1 Tim. 2:5). The last statement is about the frailty of our faith that occasionally manifests itself in temporary lapses of faithfulness to God. If we are faithless, Paul reminds us that God is always faithful to His word because He cannot deny or disown Himself (2 Tim. 2:13). Because of His very nature, God cannot fail to fulfill His promises (Num. 23:19; Heb. 6:18; 10:23). When the NT speaks of God as faithful, in almost every case it is in terms of loyalty and trustworthiness to the believer and the promises He has made to them (1 Cor. 10:13; 2 Cor. 1:18–20; 1 Thess. 5:23, 24; 2 Thess. 3:3; 1 Pet. 4:19). Paul's last statement assures us that as long as we allow God's lovingkindness to lead us to repentance (Rom. 2:4), there is no sin that can separate us from His love (Rom. 8:31–39).

2:14—3:9

Dealing with False Teachers

In this section, Paul provides guidance on how to deal with false teachings. He encouraged Timothy to resist false teachings (2:14–19), explained how the spiritual condition of the church contributes to this problem (vv. 20–21), described the responsibility of Timothy (vv. 22–26), and concluded with a prophecy about deception in the last days (3:1–9).

2:14–19. Resisting False Teachers. Referring to the truths of the gospel, Paul next invited Timothy to keep reminding believers about these things. The exhortations combine negative and positive statements. The first is not to quarrel about words or teachings that are useless and lead to the ruin of those who hear them (v. 14; cf. 1 Tim. 1:6; 6:4; Titus 3:9). These disputes could be about trivial matters or pointless theological speculations that perhaps do not seriously damage those involved but that have a negative spiritual impact on those who listen to them (cf. 1 Tim. 1:4; Titus 3:9). Paul exhorted Timothy to counter this situation by seeking God's approval and by accurately teaching the "word of truth" (2 Tim. 2:15). The antidote to these disputes is correctly interpreting, understanding, and teaching the word of God, and thus preventing misinterpretations that may cause one to lose faith in Jesus.

Paul's second recommendation to Timothy is phrased in a negative form: avoid worldly, empty talk (v. 16). Trivial and speculative topics were not to be part of Timothy's teaching ministry. Such conversations lead only to increased ungodliness and do not edify the faith of believers. These errors spread like a disease; they sweep through the church like a plague.

Clear apostolic truth alone leads to godliness and harmony among believers.

Two teachers who had caused such trouble by worldly and empty discussions were Hymenaeus and Philetus. This is likely the same Hymenaeus of 1 Timothy 1:20, who made a shipwreck of his faith and whom Paul excluded from the church in hopes that he might repent. The error of Hymenaeus and Philetus was not a minor matter or a mere mistake but one of doctrinal substance: they had deviated from the path of truth by teaching that the resurrection had already taken place (v. 18). In 1 Corinthians 15, Paul challenged those who denied the physical resurrection of Jesus. It is possible that they were claiming that it was only a spiritual resurrection—that believers were already resurrected with Christ and thus there was no need for a future resurrection. If so, this false teaching may have been influenced by a Greek understanding of the natural immortality of the soul. This might be what Hymenaeus and Philetus were teaching: that the resurrection consisted only of the believer's present spiritual relationship with Christ. But ultimately, we do not know what they were teaching because the text does not indicate the basis for their conclusions about the resurrection. What is clear is that their teaching opposed the Christian faith (2 Tim. 2:18).

Against such spreading error stands the certainty of God's knowledge and power. The church rests on God's firm foundation (v. 19; cf. Matt. 16:18; Eph. 2:19, 20). It is the product of God's grace and the object of His greatest concern and will ultimately triumph. This foundation is certified by a seal or inscription of authenticity (Rom. 4:11). To be sealed with the approval of God constitutes an assurance to believers that they belong to God: the Lord knows those who are His. This seal challenges believers, as those who claim to belong to Christ, to turn away from unrighteousness (2 Tim. 2:19; see Num. 16:26–27).

2:20–21. Analogy of Household Containers. Paul used a brief metaphor to illustrate what he had been saying. In any large house, there are containers for noble purposes made of precious metals and some for less virtuous purposes made of wood and clay (v. 20). The illustration indicates that in the church—the large house—there are two classes of people. There are those who belong to the Lord, who are known of Him, who walk in fellowship with Him, and who depart from wickedness. Then there are those who profess His name but remain in their evil ways. If true believers are to be useful containers for the Master, they must cleanse themselves from the dishonorable containers by moving away from their wickedness and false teachings and be ready to serve God through works of love (v. 21). In this way, being purified from these things refers back to either the containers of dishonor or to some other antecedent, such as the wickedness mentioned in v. 19. If it refers to the containers of dishonor, it could mean either that they were to purify themselves and become honorable by the grace of God or, more likely, that the believers were to avoid the false teachings of the containers of dishonor. A believer's life is to be set apart for God's service—"sanctified" or "made holy" (v. 21).

2:22–26. Timothy's Responsibilities. Paul returns to his exhortation to Timothy, urging him to flee from the epithymias ("desires" or "lusts") of youth (cf. 1 Tim. 6:11). This term is usually interpreted in the context of sensual desires, but it could also refer to the youthful desire to act quickly or to overreact, thus engaging in useless discussion with false teachers. Instead of doing this, Paul asked Timothy to pursue four Christian virtues: righteousness, faith, love, and peace.

Righteousness is conforming one's life to God's moral character and law; faith is an active trust in God or faithfulness to God; love is the self-sacrificing attitude and action of commitment to other believers; and peace is the harmonious relationship with God and others. These characteristics are ways in which the purity of the inner being, the heart, manifests itself in daily life (2 Tim. 2:22). Timothy's service, if exemplifying these characteristics, would have a better effect among those being deceived by false teachings. He would be able to avoid the disputes of the fool that simply result in division and contention in the church (v. 23). Instructions on how he was to relate to those who are deceived are found in vv. 24–26.

Paul called Timothy a servant or "slave" (doulos) of the Lord (v. 24). Jesus and Paul used this term to refer to those involved in the gospel ministry (Matt. 20:27; Rom. 1:1; Col. 1:7; 4:7, 12). The title indicates a complete dedication to God, just as it did for those who were called "servants" of the Lord in the OT (e.g., Josh. 14:7; 2 Kin. 17:23). That a servant must not quarrel is Paul's first counsel (2 Tim. 2:24). Instead, this person should possess a demeanor that is gentle or kind toward all, and that enables the person to teach even those who are disagreeable. Being anexikakos ("tolerant" or "patient") and prautēs ("considerate" or "humble") are qualities that are also needed to correct false teachings. Ministry/service done in this manner can touch the hearts of opponents. Paul hoped that those in opposition to his message would not reject God's call to repentance and would come to know the truth (v. 25). By his example and proper attitude, Timothy could accomplish much in correcting errors. One cannot underestimate the power of a good example in helping opponents to come to their senses (lit. "to return to soberness") after being intoxicated by false teachings (v. 26). These false teachings have been used by the enemy to hinder people from seeing the truth. There is a spiritual struggle for the control of minds and hearts. While the Lord seeks to free people with a knowledge of the truth (John 8:32) so that they might do His will, the devil seeks to deceive them through false teachings (2 Tim. 2:26). This situation will deteriorate even more as we approach the last days.

3:1–9. Troublesome Times in the Last Days. In the early church, the concept of the "last days" referred to the time period between the outpouring of God's Spirit at Pentecost and the day when Christ would return in the clouds of heaven (cf. Acts 2:17; Heb. 1:2; James 5:3; 2 Pet. 3:3). During that time—as Jesus had told His disciples—the increasing activity of the devil would lead to a moral breakdown in society (cf. Mark 13:3–13; 2 Pet. 3:3; 1 John 2:18; Jude 17–18). Paul did not want Timothy to be surprised or naïve about the troubling events occurring in Ephesus. The challenge Timothy faced in the church was merely a part of the larger outbreak of evil that would ultimately reach a climax of intensity before Christ returned. The progressive moral depravity of humanity today testifies to this truth and reveals the utter inability of human beings to save themselves.

Paul uses nineteen terms to describe the sins and sinners that characterize this age (2 Tim. 3:2–5). Three terms in this list speak of misdirected love: lovers of themselves, lovers of money (v. 2), and lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God (v. 4). The characteristics of these sins are the antithesis of the Christian spirit of unselfishness (1 Cor. 13:5) and meekness (Matt. 5:5). Self-centeredness is the key characteristic of end-time immorality. This self-absorption manifests itself in people having a boasting attitude and trusting in their own abilities regardless of the rights of others; they are proud, consider others with contempt and disrespect, and blasphēmos. This term can refer specifically to disrespecting God or more broadly to being disrespectful and slanderous toward other people as well (i.e., speaking evil of others to damage their reputation).

The next five characteristics speak of the degeneration of family and social relationships, referring to people as disobedient to their parents, ungrateful, unholy or impious (2 Tim. 3:2), unloving, and unforgiving (v. 3). The list then widens with the next seven words, indicating the terrible antisocial behavior of those who lack self-control, are slanderous, are brutal ("savage"), do not love the good, are treacherous, reckless, and conceited (vv. 3, 4). To conclude the list, Paul then relates all this immorality to spirituality. Such sinners also profess to be religious, but they are committed to self-pleasure and not to God. They may appear to be pious but lack the purity of a life of true love. Since they have repudiated truth and holy living, believers are instructed to turn away from such people and have nothing to do with them (v. 5; see 1 Cor. 5:2, 11, 13).

In the experience of the false teachers we see the shadow of what is to come. Paul returned to these false teachers, describing their current activities in the church. They are deceitful guides, propagating their religious views and creeping or worming their way into households (which could be a reference to false teachers attending meetings of house churches)—succeeding in taking captive or deceiving gynaikaria ("gullible," "idle," or "foolish") women. These women were more vulnerable because they were loaded down with or guilty of some sins, and thus more readily deceived by the offer of false hopes (2 Tim. 3:6). Paul also describes these women as being led away by various lusts or longings, possibly appeasing their consciences by excursions into religious novelties and a quasi-religious life. They were not satisfied by the teachings given to them in church and were always ready to listen to other voices (v. 7). Every new religious fad or sensation captivated them and, consequently, they never reached any settled convictions. Of course, this was not a temptation only for women; men were also gullible and attracted to false religious ideas. In this context, Paul warned Timothy that such a scenario is also a sign of how perilous the last days will be.

Paul likened these false teachers to the magicians in Pharaoh's court who opposed Moses (v. 8; Ex. 7:11). Although not identified by name in the OT, Paul follows the Jewish tradition that associates the names Jannes and Jambres with two of these pagan opponents to God. The false teachers had corrupted or depraved ways of thinking that demonstrated that the true Christian faith was not in them. Time would manifest their foolishness, just as it did with Jannes and Jambres (v. 9). As time goes on, the distinction between truth and error will become more visible to those who know the Scriptures well. To this essential element of one's ministry, Paul next turned his attention.

3:10—4:8

Final Charge to Timothy

In the final charge, Paul summarized his experience as a servant of the Lord (3:10–13), then exhorted Timothy to persevere in the teachings he had learned from the Holy Scriptures (vv. 14–15), to preach the word (4:1–2), and to be watchful (v. 5). The section concludes with Paul's own testimony of faithfulness to Christ (vv. 6–8).

3:10–17. Another Appeal. Paul introduces his appeal by summarizing his experiences and Christian conduct and sharing how God had protected him. Timothy was well-acquainted with Paul's life, which stood in striking contrast to those of the false teachers. He had witnessed how Paul stood firm in the face of persecution and suffering in three cities in the province where Timothy grew up (Acts 16:1): Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:14–50), Iconium (Acts 13:51—14:6), and Lystra (Acts 14:8–20). Paul rejoiced in testifying that the Lord delivered him from all of them (2 Tim. 3:11) and encouraged Timothy to be willing to endure humiliation and pain for the gospel. The same applies to all believers because those who follow Christ by living a pious life may have to face persecution (v. 12; Matt. 5:10–12). A life lived consistently for Christ will generate antagonism and maliciousness from those who do not share the Christian faith. As we approach the Second Coming of Christ, the evilness of false teachers or impostors will increase (2 Tim. 3:13). In each generation, evil people learn from their predecessors, adding to the intensity and volume of evil (Matt. 24:12).

Paul next addressed Timothy with his first appeal to remain faithful to the Christian message (2 Tim. 3:14). The reliability of the message is found in the witness of the Holy Scriptures and should never be left behind as we grow. The challenge is—and will continue to be—faithfulness to the biblical instruction. The Scriptures Paul refers to are primarily the OT. They reveal God's wonderful plan for the salvation of sinners through faith in Jesus Christ. This is possible because the content of all Scripture was given by inspiration of God (v. 16). Only in it has God revealed to us His salvific intentions and plans. (See "Revelation and Inspiration of the Bible," p. 11.)

In v. 16, the word theopneustos ("God-breathed") is used to refer to the inspiration of the Scriptures. This is the classic passage on the divine inspiration of the Bible. Along with 2 Peter 1:21, which teaches the divine inspiration of the human writers, this passage upholds the divine origin of the sacred Scriptures (cf. Gen. 2:7; Ps. 33:6). Paul expanded on four functions of the underlying purpose of the Bible: it is profitable and useful for doctrine or instruction in biblical truth, for reproof/rebuke (making people aware of their sinfulness and need), for correction (improving one's life), and for instruction or training in righteousness or righteous living (2 Tim. 3:16). Scripture provides the only truthful teaching about salvation, refutes false teachings and restores truth, and outlines a way of life that will help a person to grow into the likeness of Christ (see Eph. 4:13). Submission to the Scriptures will enable people to live fruitful lives in the service of God and others (2 Tim. 3:17). Christians must be well acquainted with such a God-given and profitable instrument for their spiritual growth and development.

4:1–5. Preach the Word. The second exhortation to Timothy (see 3:14) is introduced by a reference to the Second Coming of Jesus and a reference to the judgment. These are two important Christian doctrines. The judgment is universal, but for those who wait for the coming of the Lord in hope and love, the judgment means deliverance from an evil world. Anticipating the Lord coming as Judge, Paul charged Timothy to proclaim the word (vv. 1–2). In a context abounding with false teachings, Timothy was to preach the word of God. The content of the preaching comes from the inspired word of God, not from the foolishness of false teachers. Timothy, and every believer, should be able and ready to minister to others under any circumstances, whether it is convenient or inconvenient (v. 2). The gospel is always needed even though people may not realize it. As part of his preaching and teaching ministry, Timothy was to convict, rebuke, and encourage (v. 2; see 3:16). The proclamation and teaching are to be done with long-suffering or in a state of tranquility and patience. Harsh and severe rebukes never move a sinner to love Christ.

The time will come when people will not tolerate sound doctrine. Until the very end, erroneous teachings will somehow attract people. People are attracted to the sensational and the exotic. Perverted desires or lusts create a shallow-mindedness—"itching ears" seeking fanciful theories and interpretations of Scripture (4:3). Such people are interested only in those portions of Scripture that promise peace and security. They neglect the demands of sound doctrine, which cut deep into a person's heart. They have a superficial desire for spiritual growth, but only for what will not disturb the routine of their corrupt lives. Thus they seek their own instructors, disregard the truth, and accept fables or legends/stories instead of truth (v. 4; see 1 Tim. 1:4).

In contrast, Paul gave Timothy a third exhortation formed by four imperatives (see 3:14 and 4:1). Verse 5 opens with the command to nēphe ("to be sober" or "to be alert"). The next three imperatives could be a development of the first one: there are admonishments to endure suffering, particularly when encountering opposition to the gospel; to do the work of an evangelist—preaching the gospel instead of teaching fables; and to fulfill one's ministry, that is, one's service for the church (v. 5).

4:6–8. Paul's Final Testimony. Paul's final testimony gives another reason for the preceding charge and indicates that he expected his current imprisonment to end with his death. He used sacrificial images to describe his expectation: his life was to be poured out as a drink offering, a libation (v. 6; see Ex. 29:40; Lev. 23:13). There was no self-pity; rather, he saw his death as an offering to God. The imagery of "departure" compares his death to the loosening of ropes on tents when taken down or the releasing of the mooring ropes of a ship preparing to sail. There is no suggestion here of an immortal soul.

Then in three graphic phrases, Paul summarized his life and ministry: he fought a good fight and did not surrender; he finished the race and did not stop or give up along the way; and he kept (or guarded) the faith and did not betray what had been entrusted to him (2 Tim. 4:7). He was to die with the firm conviction that, by the grace of Christ, he had fulfilled God's plan for him. Though he had endured many afflictions and hardships, he had not failed to guard the gospel entrusted to him. His example of faithfulness continues to challenge any follower of Christ.

Paul faced death with hope, rejoicing in the reward awaiting him, namely, the crown of (or "that is") righteousness. Although an earthly judge may have condemned him, Jesus Christ, the righteous Judge, had decided otherwise. Paul, along with all those who have loved and longed for Jesus's appearing, will receive their rewards on that day (v. 8). Paul knew that there was no immediate entrance into heaven at death. The Second Coming of Jesus will be the day when the redeemed will be rewarded with eternal life. That is indeed a glorious hope.

Personal Remarks and Greetings

In this final section, Paul asked Timothy to come to Rome and to bring along with him Mark, as well as some personal effects he needed. He gave Timothy a final warning regarding Alexander the coppersmith, sent greetings to a few friends, and told Timothy that his days were numbered. In spite of this, Paul's faith remained strong.

4:9–18. Personal Remarks and Instructions. Paul longed for human companionship and asked Timothy to come quickly to visit him. Three companions had left him. Demas was at one time a coworker of Paul (see Col. 4:14; Philem. 24). The contrast between Demas, who loved this present world (lit. "age"; 2 Tim. 4:10), and those who had loved the Lord's appearing (v. 8) is evident. Crescens, Titus, and Tychicus—who had helped Paul—had also left, likely to preach the gospel in other regions (vv. 10, 12). Tychicus was probably the bearer of the letter, entrusted with delivering it to Timothy on his way to Ephesus (v. 12). Of his many colleagues, only Luke remained with Paul (v. 11).

The request for Mark's presence comes as a surprise (v. 11; Acts 13:13; 15:37) but indicates a change of heart for Paul, who had come to appreciate Mark's ministry. Mark had already been with Paul during his first imprisonment (Col. 4:10; Philem. 24), and the apostle believed Mark could continue to be useful and helpful to him. Paul also requested that Timothy bring along a few things he had left in Troas with Carpus. Likely, he had had to leave unexpectedly and left behind his cloak—a heavy overcoat needed in wintertime—and his books (i.e., scrolls) and parchment, most likely a reference to scrolls of the Scriptures that Paul used for his study (2 Tim. 4:13). Paul warned Timothy about Alexander the coppersmith or metalworker because Alexander opposed Paul's message (vv. 14–15). This man may be the Alexander Paul had earlier disfellowshipped from the church in Ephesus (1 Tim. 1:19–20) or perhaps the troublemaker mentioned in Acts 19:33–34. In any case, this man had caused Paul serious harm, but the apostle trusted that the Lord would repay him according to his actions (2 Tim. 4:14).

The first defense mentioned in v. 16 is probably the first hearing of Paul's case associated with his current imprisonment. At that time, all his friends—probably out of fear—abandoned him, but he here asks God not to hold it against them but to forgive them (v. 16; cf. Luke 23:34). He was not abandoned by all, because the Lord stood with him. Although all may fail us, the Lord will always be faithful to us. On that occasion, Paul shared with the court his understanding of the gospel message so that all the Gentiles might hear it (2 Tim. 4:17). Even under such adverse circumstances, he fulfilled his divine calling. For the moment, he had been delivered from imminent danger. Even if physical death came upon him, he knew that the Lord would deliver him from every evil and bring him safely to His heavenly kingdom (v. 18). Hope was deeply embedded in the fabric of Paul's life.

4:19–22. Final Greetings. Paul concluded his letter with greetings to several people: Priscilla (or Prisca) and Aquila (cf. Acts 18:1–3, 18–26; Rom. 16:3–4) and the household of Onesiphorus (2 Tim. 1:16–18). His friend Erastus had remained in Corinth, and his friend Trophimus remained in Miletus due to sickness. In 2 Timothy 4:9, Paul had urged Timothy to come quickly, before winter, as stormy weather would make his travel difficult and prevent Paul from having his cloak (v. 13). Finally, a few other companions of Paul in Rome—three of them with Latin names, suggesting they were likely local believers—sent greetings to Timothy. Christian tradition identifies Linus as the first bishop of Rome (v. 21).

Paul's last words were a blessing to Timothy. The first part concerns Timothy personally, asking that the Lord be constantly with him—with his "spirit." "Spirit" designates the whole person, with an emphasis on the spiritual and mental aspects (see Gal. 6:18; Phil. 4:23; Philem. 25; cf. 1 Thess. 5:23, 28). The second part asks that the favor of God, His grace, be with all those in the church (2 Tim. 4:22). Paul closed the letter caring for the church, knowing that he would soon give his life in the service of the Lord but encouraged by a living hope that anticipates the heavenly kingdom.

TITUS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. As is the case with all of Paul's letters, his letter to Titus did not originally have a title attached to it. As Paul's letters were copied and circulated among the churches, titles were added to help readers distinguish each letter. Among the earliest manuscripts, it is simply titled "To Titus." In an attempt to provide readers with more information about the letter, scribes expanded the title with additional details they believed were associated with the letter. The most common expanded title that emerged in the tenth century and later is "To Titus, appointed as first bishop of the church of the Cretans, written from Nicopolis of Macedonia." Despite the good intentions of some later scribes, in this case the expanded title is not entirely correct. At the time Paul wrote this letter, he was not yet at Nicopolis (3:12), and Titus was more of an apostolic delegate than an actual bishop.

From the earliest days of the Christian church, Paul was identified as the author of the letter to Titus. After nearly two millennia of acceptance, this view began to change with the rise of the Enlightenment and the development of biblical criticism among German scholars. Critical scholars claimed that the letter's vocabulary, ecclesiology, and literary style were so different from Paul's other letters that someone else must have written it. While differences certainly do exist, they are not the decisive evidence against Pauline authorship, as critical scholars claim. They can easily be accounted for by Paul's probable use of an amanuensis (e.g., Rom. 16:22)—a scribe or literary assistant who would write what was dictated by an author, yet sometimes in their own style and words—and by the fact that he was addressing a personal colleague. It is the assumption of this commentary that the Apostle Paul wrote to Titus toward the end of his life, likely with the help of a scribe, in response to specific challenges facing the church.

Date. Due to the similarities between Titus and 1 Timothy, it is likely that they were written about the same time, probably around A.D. 65, while Paul was on his way to the city of Nicopolis in Macedonia (3:12).

Backgrounds. See 1 Timothy: Introduction. Crete, the original destination of the letter, is an island in the Mediterranean Sea that lies south of the Aegean Sea, separating Greece from Asia Minor. Paul had apparently worked in Crete with Titus and left him there to complete what was unfinished and to appoint elders (1:5). While Paul was concerned about the appointment of spiritual leaders, he also had concerns about believers who were being persuaded by false teachers. He wrote to anchor the new believers in the hope that is found only in Christ.

Theology and Purpose. The messages of hope and practical godliness dovetail throughout this letter. Paul desired that the hope of the Second Coming of Jesus (2:13) would have an impact on the daily life of the believer (2:12). The introductory section of the letter (1:1–4) gives an indication of the message, with specific themes that are developed within the letter. It is the longest introduction of the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim., 2 Tim., and Titus).

1. Importance of Hope. There are a number of theological topics that are inseparable from the hope of the community and that are mentioned several times in Titus: faith appears in all three chapters of the epistle (1:1, 4, 13; 2:2, 10; 3:15); knowledge is explicitly found in 1:1, 16, and it is implied in 2:1–10; godliness features explicitly in chapters one and two and implicitly in chapter three (1:1; 2:12; 3:3–7); hope is mentioned in all three chapters (1:2; 2:13; 3:7); and we also find references to eternal life (1:2; 3:7) and salvation (1:3, 4; 2:10–11, 13; 3:4–6). There is also an emphasis on hope in connection with a godly life (1:1–2; 2:11–12; 3:1–7). Each of these themes contributes to highlight the message of hope that is anchored on God, whose promises are reliable because He "cannot lie" (1:2). This picture of God is vastly different from Zeus, a Greek deity, who was born on Crete and was well-known for his deceptive ways.

2. The Community of Believers. The unique way in which God is presented in the letter to Titus brings to focus the need of the community of believers to whom it was addressed. The faith of the Cretan believers and their growth in the knowledge of the truth had to bear fruit. The transforming power of the gospel needed to be exhibited in godly lives. The end result of the outworking of the word of God—given through the teaching of sound doctrine (2:1)—is the hope of eternal life based on God's own promise (Acts 26:6; Rom. 14:13–20).

The way the community of believers was addressed seems to resonate with the societal structures of the time (2:1—3:8; cf. Eph. 5:21—6:9; Col. 3:18—4:1; 1 Tim. 2:1–15; 5:1–2; 6:1–2). This should not be understood as a divine endorsement of first century society. It simply reveals that God meets people where they are, with the goal of transforming them into the people He wants them to be. The message of the gospel does not change, but the methods are adapted to meet the needs of the audience.

Paul assigned Titus, his apostolic delegate or representative, to facilitate the selection of leaders and counseled him on how he should go about this task (Titus 1:5–9). He also had other concerns relating to the spiritual growth of the members, like the threat of the false teachers who were already gaining ground (1:10–16). Paul therefore instructed Titus to work with the different groups and emphasized the importance of teaching the members and grounding them in the faith (2:1–15).

COMMENTARY

Opening Greetings

Titus 1:1–4 identifies Paul as the writer of the letter, states the purpose of his ministry as an apostle (v. 1), and establishes the foundation of his apostleship (vv. 2–3). Paul identifies the recipient of the letter as Titus (v. 4). In this section, Paul introduces the key concepts that will be developed throughout the epistle.

Paul used two titles to introduce himself: "servant of God" and "apostle of Jesus Christ" (1:1). By calling himself a "servant/slave" of God he identified himself with Christ, the true Servant/Slave of God (Phil. 2:7). The title emphasizes submission, dependence, and willingness to serve. "Apostle" designates Paul as one sent by God on a mission of love. It places the emphasis on the authority that God gave him to proclaim the gospel and to function as a leader in the church. The two titles together affirm the exercise of authority in the context of service and submission to God and to others. It reminds us that leadership in the church has to manifest itself in a spirit of humble service to the people of God.

The titles lead to a description of the goal of the ministry of Paul the apostle. What he was doing was for the benefit of "the faith of God's elect" (Titus 1:1). He would nurture their faith through instruction about its content and its implications for the Christian life. Believers are described as chosen or elected by God. They are His people. Paul also aimed at proclaiming the knowledge (or acknowledgment) of the truth. This is the rational understanding of the truth of salvation received through the proclamation of the gospel (cf. 1 Tim. 2:3–6). There is a body of biblical beliefs that should be understood and incorporated into life. But Paul wanted his readers to understand that this type of knowledge is more than knowing the facts of our salvation; it is related to a life of godliness. Biblical truth should lead to godliness; otherwise it has not been fully comprehended. Godliness designates the life that is pleasing to the Lord because it is lived in submission to His loving will. Although this specific term is not used in Paul's earlier epistles, godliness plays an important role in the message of the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim. 4:7–8; 6:3, 5, 11; 2 Tim. 3:5). As Paul reflected on the life of the church in his later years, and likely the growing problem with the false teachers, he reminded the followers of Jesus that they should never separate the knowledge of the truth of salvation from a life that corresponds to the life of our living Lord.

In his greeting, Paul introduced his message of hope based on the promises of a God who cannot lie (1:2). God's promises would culminate in the "blessed hope," ushering in the Second Coming of Jesus Christ (2:13). Believers are made heirs according to "the hope of eternal life." The relationship between God the Father and God the Son is expressed in the usage of the word "Savior"—used six times in Titus: three times with reference to God (1:3; 2:10; 3:4) and three times to refer to Jesus (1:4; 2:13; 3:6).

Qualified Leaders

The relationship between Paul and Titus may be traced to the time when they worked together in the Lord's vineyard (2 Cor. 7:6, 13–15; 8:16–17; Gal. 2:1, 3; 2 Tim. 4:10). The cooperation between these leaders is seen by Titus's work in Crete under Paul's guidance (Titus 1:10–16; 3:12–14). The island of Crete had a Jewish community already in existence by the first century. This is confirmed by the mention in Acts 2:11 of some Judeans from Crete who came to celebrate Pentecost in Jerusalem. After these devout Jewish Cretans heard the preaching of the apostles, they went back to share the message with the Jewish communities on the island.

The task assigned to Titus came with specific guidelines from Paul on how to implement it. Titus was to appoint leaders and to equip the church to deal with the growing presence of false teachers. Although the problem with false teachers in Crete does not appear to have been as widespread as it was in Ephesus (cf. 1 Tim. 1:3–11, 18–20; 4:1–7; 6:3–10, 20–21), Paul still recognized that having the right kind of spiritual leaders plays an invaluable part in the health and life of the church. Paul demonstrated that the goal of his ministry was the faith of the elect motivated by the hope of eternal life (1:1–2). He gave a set of criteria to be followed in appointing church elders. The list is virtually identical to the guidelines Paul gave to Timothy in Ephesus (cf. 1 Tim. 3:1–7). One of the notable differences, however, is that in 1 Timothy, Paul also set forth the criteria for the selection of deacons (3:8–13). This is likely because the church in Ephesus was larger and better established, thus requiring additional leaders.

Before considering the criteria that should guide in the selection of local church elders, note that the focus is not on the type of gifts and abilities a person may have but rather on the character of the individual. While the church certainly benefits from gifted leaders, character is always more important. In order to assess a person's character, Paul began with familial relations (Titus 1:6). The reason for this is simple: people are best known through their familial relationships. The Cretan believers were largely organized according to households. Therefore, Paul, guided by the Spirit, placed an emphasis on the ability to lead a household and used this as a criterion for leadership in the church. Elders were expected to be faithful to their spouse (see 1 Tim. 3:2) and to have faithful, believing children (grounded in the faith) who were not profligate or rebellious, particularly with regard to their parents (cf. Ex. 20:12).

Paul stated some vices that should not be found in an elder (Titus 1:7) and some expected virtues (1:8). This list is not exhaustive, but it gives an idea of what the church was grappling with on the island of Crete. The qualifications do not require that elders be married, but if married they should have—as much as possible—an exemplary family. Paul was aware of the presence of false teachers and wanted to have leaders for the Cretan church who would be a positive influence when imparting proper gospel teaching to the new converts. They should be qualified to deal with the false teachings that were threatening the young church (1:9). These new leaders had to rely on God's word to achieve the purpose for which they were called to leadership. There is also an emphasis on maintaining the true, faithful word or message as it had been taught and passing it on like a torch of light through exhortation.

Among the list of qualifications for an elder is the ability to teach (cf. 1 Tim. 3:2). In Titus, there is an added emphasis on the trustworthiness of the word (1:9). The word is not simply a tradition passed on from one apostle to the next but it is traced back to God. Paul acknowledged the importance of rightly maintaining the true word—something that God had commended to him and commanded he proclaim (1:3). The qualifications for leadership swing on this important hinge: faithfulness and commitment to the reliable word. Verse 9 ends the leadership profile required and offers a transition to the discussion of the function of leadership in ministry.

Paul's aim was more than to simply criticize the Cretan community for their evils. He wanted to expose the false teachers in the church for their lies. Therefore, in bringing up the riddle drawn from Cretan literature—known by the community—he humorously put to shame those who were trying to bring down the work that he and his associates were trying to build up. Paul warned and charged the leaders to rebuke the false teachers sharply so that they would all learn to be sound in the faith (v. 13). Faith, in this context, does not have an object; therefore it sums up what it means to be a Christian. With this in mind, faith can also be understood as the message of the gospel or the truth (cf. Rom. 1:5; Gal. 1:23; 1 Tim. 1:2, 4; 2 Tim. 1:5; 2:18). In the church, erroneous teaching cannot coexist with sound teaching. It is therefore imperative that Scripture and sound teaching, based on the word of God, become the standard by which deviating members are rebuked.

The conjunction "for" in v. 10 indicates that what follows in vv. 10–16 is directly connected to Paul's instructions regarding the selection criteria of church leaders. The church needed to have the right kind of spiritual leaders due to the corrupting influence of false teachers, as well as others identified as rebellious and insubordinate: vain talkers and liars (v. 10; cf. 1 Tim. 1:6–7; 6:4, 20–21). The origin of these troublemakers was particularly among "those of the circumcision"—an expression Paul uses elsewhere to refer to Jews (Rom. 4:12) but more frequently to Jewish converts to Christianity (Gal. 2:7–9, 12; Col. 4:11). These individuals were teaching forbidden things for the sake of dishonest gain (Titus 1:11; cf. 1 Tim. 6:5–10). But the problem was more than just what they believed and taught; it was also their behavior. In their actions, they undermined their profession of knowing God—being repulsive, disobedient, disqualified, and unfit for working for the Lord (Titus 1:16). These false teachers had been successful in persuading whole households or families to turn from the truth (v. 11; cf. 2 Tim. 3:6–7). They were following mythical, human-centered ideas (Titus 1:14; cf. 1 Tim. 4:7). They professed to know God, which also implied a claim to know the truth (Titus 1:1), but their behavior denied that claim, as revealed in their lack of godliness (1:1; 1 Tim. 4:7–8).

While these problems were similar to those in Ephesus, they do not appear to have been as developed in Crete, since Paul did not focus on them as much. Nevertheless, these individuals were still unsettling the faith of many in Crete, and Paul felt that they should not be allowed to speak. The Greek word used here is epistomizō. It literally means "to put something on the mouth" to silence it, such as gagging a person or muzzling an animal. The manner in which Paul envisioned this happening can be seen in his instructions to rebuke them sharply (Titus 1:13) It also explains the importance of selecting church leaders grounded in the truth and therefore able to guide the church with correct teachings and to oppose those contradicting them (v. 9). It is important to note, however, the redemptive purpose of such stern rebuke—to move them to be "sound (healthy) in the faith" (v. 13). Throughout the history of Christianity, individuals and groups have pursued paths contrary to the faith. Paul, in this passage, models to Titus how the church should deal with such deviant members. The aim should always be to reclaim the dissenting members (cf. 2 Tim. 2:24–26). Paul's assessment of the situation in Crete had apparently not yet reached a point where the members had to be removed from the community of faith (cf. 1 Cor. 5:1–5; 1 Tim. 1:19–20). There was still hope that the labor of Titus and the elders of the church would yield positive results that would bring about a turnaround of the situation. Paul's focus in Titus is more on teaching than on discipline. He may have realized that the need for quality leadership provided an opportunity to deal with deviant behavior and beliefs. He therefore instructed Titus to "set in order the things that are lacking" (Titus 1:5).

Instructions to Various Groups

Titus was charged with the responsibility of preaching what was fitting for sound doctrine (v. 1). Paul provides the basic instruction to be given to the household of believers. We find similar passages in other parts of the NT (e.g., Eph. 5:21—6:9; Col. 3:18—4:1; 1 Tim. 2:1–15; 1 Pet. 2:18—3:7; see "Ancient Household Codes," p. 1721). While there are notable similarities between the passages that carry these household codes, there are also significant differences. For example, Colossians 3:18—4:1 addresses groups in pairs of familial relationships (husbands/wives; children/parents; slaves/masters). In Titus 1:1–10, the congregation is divided according to age and sex (cf. 1 Tim. 5:1–6).

Titus 2 contains sets of instructions for older men (v. 2); older women (vv. 3, 4); younger women (vv. 4, 5); younger men (v. 6); Titus, the pastor (vv. 7, 8); and slaves (vv. 9, 10). In Titus 3:1–2 there are instructions for the entire congregation. The household codes listed above differ in content and form. The best explanation for this diversity is that these household codes deal with real, concrete, and contextual issues and needs within the church.

It is imperative to seek the principles behind the instructions that will always be relevant to the church. The key element is the teaching of a sound doctrine that leads to sound faith (2:1–2). This kind of faith is further described in 2:10 in contrast to robbery. The end result of faith in this sense is that they would kosmeō the teachings from "God our Savior" (v. 10). Kosmeō can mean "to adorn," "put in order," "do credit to," or "to make attractive." The way the verb is used here suggests the meaning "do credit to" or "make attractive." Instead of robbing Christian doctrine of its value, we ought to do credit to it and make it appear as attractive as it truly is. This is further demonstrated in the ethical life that finds its basis on sound faith and doctrine (vv. 1–10).

The Blessed Hope

While Paul customarily begins with the good news of God's grace as revealed in Jesus and then provides ethical instruction on how life should be lived in response to the gospel (cf. Rom. 3:21—8:39; 12:1—15:13), here the process is reversed. Having started with the ethical responsibilities of the Christian (Titus 2:1–10), the apostle next provides the reason or basis for living a virtuous life. He highlights his point by applying the literary device of personification to God's grace.

God's saving grace has appeared to all people (v. 11). While this passage does not teach universalism, it does affirm God's gracious disposition to all humanity. It is by grace that salvation is freely offered to every human being on account of Christ's atoning sacrifice (3:4–7). The coming of Christ was an epiphany of saving grace unlike anything before it (John 1:14, 16). But grace is not only personified as Savior. It also acts as an instructor who teaches us (Titus 2:12) that we should live sensibly, justly, and godly in this present age. The depiction of God's grace offered here is not a permissive grace that downplays the importance of obedience. Through sound teaching, grace instructs and enables us to live in harmony with God's ideals. As we submit to its work in our lives, it also changes the way we view the world. For God's people the world is not an end in itself, for they are anticipating "the blessed hope" (v. 13).

Paul identified the appearing of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ as the focus of the blessed hope. Exactly whom Paul had in mind in this verse has puzzled many. Is he referring to two persons, that is, God the Father and Jesus our Savior—or one person, Jesus, who is identified as both God and Savior? Those who believe two persons are in view note that although Paul often refers to God and Christ side by side (e.g., Titus 1:4; 3:4–6; 1 Cor. 1:3; 2 Cor. 1:2; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1–2; 1 Tim. 1:1–2; 2 Tim. 1:1–2), he always distinguishes between them. They also note that, with perhaps the exception of Rom. 9:5, Paul never explicitly refers to Christ as God.

The evidence suggesting Paul was referring to Jesus as both God and Savior is significant. In Greek there is no definite article before "Savior," implying that the one article before God governs both nouns, as it does elsewhere in Greek. Additionally, in every other place where the Greek word translated as "appearing" occurs (epiphaneia), it describes an epiphany of Christ (2 Thess. 2:8; 1 Tim. 6:14; 2 Tim. 1:10; 4:1, 8). The context of the passage also seems to imply this, since the following verse describes Christ alone (Titus 2:14). This is, in fact, the way the majority of Greek church fathers understood the passage. Finally, it is also noted that during the first century, the expression "God and Savior" was a phrase used to refer to a single deity, or at times to the Roman Emperor.

Regardless of which interpretation an individual may find more convincing, it should be noted that in both cases Jesus Christ is still placed on an equal level with God. The second interpretation only makes Christ's equality with the Father more explicit.

Twice in vv. 11 and 13 an "appearance" is mentioned. In the first case, God's grace in history offering salvation to all people is said to have appeared (v. 11), and in the second (v. 13), we read about Jesus Christ appearing in glory at the end. Sandwiched between these epiphanies is an educative process (some have called it the school of grace). Grace and salvation are meaningless without a growing understanding of the person of Jesus Christ and what it truly means to follow Him. This becomes clear in the second epiphany (v. 13), in which Jesus Christ is described explicitly. This appearance is described as the "blessed hope." This implies that the God who is introduced in 1:2 as a God who promised the hope of eternal life to His expectant children will not fail to deliver His promise of salvation. The three specific outcomes of the educative process brought about by grace in the life of a believer are salvation (2:11), godliness (v. 12), and hope (v. 13).

Throughout the epistle, there is a sense of godliness and ungodliness in contrast. The use of the word in v. 12 relates to the human relationship to God, and it means to live in a godly manner. This manner of living is not an end in itself but rather finds meaning in the hope of God's salvation through Jesus Christ (cf. Ev 220).

In a world of broken promises and relationships, the hope of the coming of Christ helps us to live sensibly, justly, and godly in this present age (v. 12). This hope is based on a reliable source: a "God who cannot lie" (1:2). The currencies of this world provide the hope for many, but with the ever-changing economic climate, we should put our treasure in heaven (Matt. 6:20). This blessed hope is a climax of God's grace that has appeared in the person of Jesus Christ to all people (Titus 2:11). The climax of God's revelation is Jesus, who gave Himself for us to redeem us from all wicked lawlessness and to purify for Himself a special people, eager and zealous for doing what is right (v. 14). This hope separates God's people from the people of the world. Tragically, the members of the Cretan congregation were being robbed of this hope by the false teachers, who persuaded entire families and households and who were teaching forbidden things for the sake of dishonest gain (1:10).

There is an interesting textual connection between Titus 2:14 and the OT. A comparison between Psalm 129:8 and Titus 2:14 suggests that Paul was drawing on this earlier OT passage. In the LXX translation of the psalm, it is God "who will redeem Israel from all its lawlessness/iniquity" (lytrōsetai ton Israēl ek pasōn tōn anomiōn autou), and in Titus 2:14, it is Christ who gave Himself to redeem us from all lawlessness and iniquity (lytrōsētai hēmas apo pasēs anomias). In Psalm 129:8, the object of redemption is "Israel," while in Titus 2:14 it is "us." The clear similarity in thought and expression between these two passages indicates that Paul believed God's promises to His people were now being fulfilled in Christ. Titus speaks about God's intention to cleanse a special people for Himself, indicating how important it is to live a holy life before the Lord, who is in charge of cleansing us. The outcome of the appearance of the Messiah in history, and the educative process implied in His first coming, prepares a people eager and zealous for doing what is right (v. 14).

Christian Conduct

The ethical instructions that begin this section of Paul's letter to Titus were directed to the congregation as a whole, not to any specific group. The instructions focus initially on the importance of being subject to the "rulers and authorities" (v. 1) and further extends to instructions for dealing with all people (v. 2). The civil conduct of the members and their respect for civil authorities was not to be motivated by earthly concerns but by a solid theological and ethical foundation (vv. 3–7). In developing this theological basis, Paul used the same epiphany language he had used earlier (2:11–13). He explained that they used to be foolish, disobedient, and enslaved to evil desires and pleasures—living in malice, envy, and hatred. But then the kindness and love of God our Savior appeared (3:3–4). The means of salvation is through Jesus Christ, as was mentioned in the previous chapter. But this time it is added that Jesus saved us in His mercy through the Holy Spirit's washing, rebirth, and renewal (v. 5). The language used to describe how the Spirit comes to the believer suggests a possible connection with Ezekiel 36:18, 27. Titus 3:6 and Ezekiel speak about the pouring out of God's wrath (Ezek. 36:18) and the promise of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (36:27). In Titus 3:3 we read that the Cretans, because of their sinful behavior, were the objects of God's wrath. Then Paul says that the Holy Spirit was poured out through Jesus Christ (v. 6).

There is an implicit contrast between ungodliness and godliness in vv. 3–7, even though the words are not used. The vices listed in v. 3 that can be summed up as ungodliness are juxtaposed with the kindness and love of God (v. 4). It is not by our own virtues that godliness is achieved. Salvation is God's work all the way, and the end result—godliness—is also credited to Him. The climax of God's work in us is the "hope of eternal life" (v. 7). Therefore, the emphasis on good works in v. 8 is understood from the perspective that salvation is the work of God and godliness is the product of faith in God.

In this passage, the work of the Holy Spirit in salvation is highlighted (vv. 5–7). In Ephesians, Paul told the church members that they were sealed with the Holy Spirit, who pledges a guarantee of our coming inheritance (Eph. 1:13–14). Our hope of eternal life is guaranteed by the work of the Holy Spirit. He is at work in the hearts of individual members—washing, regenerating, and renewing lives deadened by sin. We were brought again into favor with God by the washing, renewal, and rebirth of the Holy Spirit. This washing is the burial with Christ in the water in the likeness of His death, representing that all who repent of their sins receive purification and cleansing through the work of the Holy Spirit.

Baptism represents and certifies true conversion—the work that the Holy Spirit has accomplished in the life of the believer. This work of the Spirit in the human heart is inseparable from our willingness to serve the Lord. There are things that Christians should avoid: foolish arguments, genealogies, and controversies and fights over the law (Titus 3:9). Paul also outlined a method for dealing with a divisive person.

Ever-present hope for the person's repentance necessitates opportunity through the first and second warnings (v. 10). Paul said the divisive person who does not heed the warnings given may be excluded from the community of faith.

3:12–15
Last Words

In his closing remarks, Paul mentions four of his fellow workers: Artemas, Tychicus, Zenas, and Apollos. The passage discloses some of the ways in which the movement of workers took place in the apostolic churches. Paul wanted Titus to join him in Nicopolis; before Titus left, however, Paul wanted to make sure that either Artemas or Tychicus would take over Titus's responsibilities. Paul also asked Titus to make sure that two other co-workers had all they needed before going out as missionaries. This moved Paul to encourage the church to do good deeds of loving service by providing for the needs of others. This is a characteristic of the fruitful Christian life.

Paul and those who were with him sent their greetings to Titus and to "those who love us in the faith" (v. 15). This last phrase could suggest to some that there were people in the church who did not love Paul and that he was not sending greetings to them. This is probably true, because the false teachers would not be interested in Paul and he would not want to give the impression that he was supporting them by greeting them as Christians. In that case, the phrase "in the faith" could mean "as Christians" or "as believers," or even in a common faith. The benediction is found in the last sentence: Paul's wish that God's grace be with them all. He asked God to always be gracious to them as they struggled for their faith in difficult situations. He reminded them that they were not alone in their Christian pilgrimage—a pilgrimage that will reach its climax in the realization of "the blessed hope" (2:13).

PHILEMON

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. As a personal letter, Paul's epistle to Philemon did not originally have a title. The earliest copy of Philemon, a papyrus fragment written in Greek that dates to the third century (P87), also has no title. It is not until the fourth century that the title "To Philemon" (pros philēmona) appears as a short subscript added by a scribe to the end of the letter (Codex Sinaiticus).

Although critical scholars once questioned the authenticity of the Epistle to Philemon, there is little doubt today that Paul the apostle was its author. The style and vocabulary, as well as the theological themes of reconciliation and forgiveness that comprise the letter, are characteristically Pauline. In addition to Paul, Timothy is also identified in the salutation as a co-sender of the letter (1:1). Co-sender, however, should not be understood as joint author. While the first-person common plural is mentioned once in some Greek manuscripts (v. 7), Paul addressed Philemon directly a total of eleven times (vv. 4, 7, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 19, 20, 21, 22). Timothy's name was likely included in the salutation—as it is in several of Paul's other letters (2 Cor. 1:1; Phil. 1:1; Col. 1:1; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1)—on account of the relationship Timothy had with its recipients. It is not hard to imagine that during the nearly three years Paul spent in Ephesus, Timothy would have had the opportunity to become acquainted with Philemon, perhaps at a time when Philemon journeyed to Ephesus on business.

Date. Paul wrote this personal and persuasive letter to Philemon while a prisoner (vv. 9, 23). A comparison of the names in this epistle and those mentioned in Colossians indicate that the two letters were written from the same location, and at roughly the same time (cf. Col. 4:7–17). Although some scholars have suggested Caesarea or Ephesus as the place of imprisonment, it almost universally accepted that the letter to Philemon was written during Paul's imprisonment in Rome, described in Acts 28:14–31 (see Colossians: Introduction). Assuming this is the case, these two letters were likely written sometime between A.D. 60 and 61.

Backgrounds. Colossae was a city in the Roman province of Asia (part of modern Turkey). It was located about one hundred miles (161 km) east of Ephesus and more than one thousand miles (1,609 km) southeast of Rome in the Lycus River Valley. It was not far from the other two main cities in the valley: Laodicea and Hierapolis. The churches in these cities had been founded not by Paul but by a local inhabitant from Colossae named Epaphras (see Colossians: Introduction). Epaphras appears to have become acquainted with Paul and accepted the gospel due to the apostle's ministry in Ephesus. Epaphras then took the good news back to his friends and family in the Lycus River Valley (Col. 1:7).

The catalyst of the letter was a crisis in the life of a young man named Onesimus. Onesimus was a slave owned by Philemon, a wealthy Christian businessman. Due to Paul's statement that if Onesimus had wronged Philemon in any way that Paul would provide reimbursement (Philem. 18), it has generally been assumed that Onesimus had wronged his master in some way, as slaves often did, and had fled, perhaps helping himself to some money as he left. We do not know why he fled to Rome. Some have suggested his motivation was to obtain his freedom. Wanting to get as far from Colossae as possible, he fled to Rome, hoping to disappear among the imperial capital's teeming mass of nondescript slaves and start a new life. Then, through a stroke of providence, one of Paul's colleagues happened upon Onesimus and brought him to Paul.

Another possibility is that Onesimus was captured and ended up imprisoned with Paul, although Onesimus might not have been a runaway slave at all, at least not in the strict sense of the term. Overcome with worry and seeing no way out of the trouble he faced with his master, Philemon, Onesimus fled to Rome to find Paul and to ask him to intervene on his behalf. While Roman law severely punished runaway slaves, and those who sought to harbor them, slaves had the legal right to seek the help of a prominent individual to act as an intercessor on their behalf. In these cases, a slave could not legally be considered a runaway. If this was the case, the purpose of Onesimus's trip to Rome was to achieve reconciliation with his master.

Whatever the exact circumstances may have been, it was while in prison that Paul appears to have shared the gospel with Onesimus and led him to Christ. Subsequently, Onesimus devotedly attended to Paul in his imprisonment, and the two men established a strong Christian bond (vv. 10, 11, 16). Unless Onesimus wanted to live the rest of his life as a fugitive, however, his situation had to be resolved legally. Roman law provided Paul with three possible solutions: he could arrange for Onesimus to be sold to a new master, with the proceeds from the sale being returned to Philemon; he could arrange for Onesimus to find refuge at a temple until he could be sold to another master or purchase his own freedom; he could intervene with Philemon to rectify the situation and reconcile the two men. Paul opted for the final option but even asked Philemon to grant Onesimus his freedom and to receive him as an equal brother in Christ (v. 16).

Without waiting for Philemon's response to Paul's appeal on his behalf, Onesimus set out on the one thousand-mile (1,609 km) journey from Rome to Colossae. The journey would have been hazardous for Onesimus to make alone—especially as a runaway slave—so Paul arranged for Onesimus to return to Colossae with Tychicus. In addition to bearing Paul's letter to Philemon, Onesimus and Tychicus also appear to have carried Paul's letters to the Colossians and the Ephesians (Col. 4:7–9).

Unfortunately, Scripture says nothing about what happened once Onesimus arrived in Colossae. The fact that the book of Philemon was included in the biblical canon, however, makes it reasonable to assume that Philemon responded positively to Paul's appeal. Fifty years later, an early Christian named Ignatius made reference to a trip to Rome in which he met the bishop of Ephesus—a much beloved man by the name of Onesimus. If this is the same person mentioned in the book of Philemon, as many believe, it would be a fitting conclusion to the amazing power of divine love, so transformative to the hearts of the Christians in Colossae that a lowly slave became not only a brother but a bishop.

Theology and Purpose. The book of Philemon is brief but life-changing. Its primary theme is forgiveness through the work of a mediator. This forgiveness results in loving reconciliation, Christian unity, and the practical acceptance of the equality of all believers. This passionate and persuasive account provides a living example of the power of the gospel to overcome inadequate cultural and social norms and prejudices. It provides a foundational road map for Christian interpersonal relationships in the church and in society. Its full implementation in the church will define it as a community of believers free from social and racial inequalities that are incompatible with the gospel of Jesus Christ.

1. Possible Theological Perspectives. This practical letter can be studied from various perspectives. It can be approached from the vantage point of Philemon, a slave owner who faced the dilemma of the conveniences of slavery versus the obligations of Christian equality. Next is the viewpoint of Onesimus, the converted slave, who understood the indignity of being chattel and experienced conflict regarding the duty of restitution. Then there is the standpoint of Paul, advocate of the Christian paradigm, who subtly challenged the existing social institution of slavery. There is also the unique outlook of Tychicus, companion of Paul and traveling partner with Onesimus, who understood the dynamics of the crisis, its resolution, and the interpersonal dilemmas.

2. Theological Topics. Philemon also contains other theological themes that can be helpful when studying, preaching, and teaching. First, it demonstrates the interplay of Christian duty and restitution with equality and human rights. Second, it reveals the outworking of God's providence in the lives of human beings. Third, it provides an example of Christian persuasion, emotional intelligence, and healthy confrontation. Fourth, it exhibits the what, why, and how of forgiveness in practical Christian living. Finally, it illustrates how leaders can personally advocate for and assist those in need.

3. The Theology of Mediation. Perhaps the theological center of the Epistle to Philemon is found in the role of Paul as mediator between Onesimus and Philemon—using as a model the mediation of Christ for us. An offense was committed, a relationship was broken, and the result was alienation between Onesimus and Philemon. Paul interceded for Onesimus on the basis of the love characterizing the life of Philemon (vv. 5, 9). Without that love, Philemon's decision would have been made under compulsion (v. 14). Paul simply wanted the love uniting him and Philemon to extend to Onesimus.

But what about the damage done? The intercessor and mediator would assume responsibility for it and pay it on Onesimus's behalf (vv. 18–19). It seems obvious that Paul is using Christ's work on behalf of believers as a model of reconciliation between Onesimus and Philemon. Christ offered to be our Mediator and to intercede before God for us and, based on their mutual love for humanity, to ask that the divine Love grant us forgiveness and acceptance. Christ freed us from the power of sin and took our infinite debt; He paid that debt on the cross so we could be reconciled to the Father. The proper response to this divine expression of grace is gratitude.

RESTORING BROKEN RELATIONSHIPS

With this letter, Paul was attempting to persuade Philemon to receive Onesimus as a brother in Christ and to treat him as such. After the salutation (vv. 1–3), Paul recognizes the quality of the Christian life of Philemon and his love for believers (vv. 4–7). This is followed by a direct appeal to him (vv. 8–14) and a direct intercession on behalf of Onesimus (vv. 15–22). The letter closes with a farewell (vv. 23–25).

Paul's Greetings

The letter follows the first-century practice of including the name of the author and the recipients as part of the salutation. Within the NT, Philemon (lit. "affectionate," "loving") is one of only three persons to have received a personal letter from the Apostle Paul (Timothy and Titus were the others). The letter opens with the name of its author, Paul. Reference is made to Timothy, Paul's well-known companion and fellow leader. Paul considered himself to be a prisoner (desmios; "a captive in bonds"), not of Rome but of Christ, because of his providential call to His service (cf. Eph. 3:1; Phil. 1:13; Col. 4:3; see also Acts 26:32, 28:30, 31). Paul refers to his imprisonment six times (Philem. 1, 9, 10, 13, 22, 23). Philemon was apparently a close friend (agapētos; "beloved" or "dear"; v. 1) of Paul and may have been converted during the apostle's ministry in Ephesus (ca. A.D. 54–57; cf. v. 19).

Most scholars suggest that Apphia was Philemon's wife and Archippus was his son and a minister (cf. v. 2; Col. 4:17). The letter is also addressed to the church that met in Philemon's home. By expanding the letter's recipients, Paul widened the circle of accountability and was instructing the church on the subject of forgiveness. Paul greeted them with grace (charis; "unmerited favor") and peace (eirēnē; "harmony"), as the gifts coming from the Father and the Son.

Paul's Affirmation of Philemon

Paul prepared Philemon for his request by sincerely emphasizing the quality of Philemon's commitment to Christ and to the church. He was grateful to God for Philemon, whom he mentioned constantly in his prayers (v. 4). He had been impressed by Philemon's love and faith in the Lord, manifested in the way he dealt with others. Philemon's humility and self-sacrifice were well-known (v. 5). Those who have such qualities manifest devotion to God and to believers (cf. Rom. 5:5; Gal. 5:22; 1 John 3:14). The most effective service Paul could provide for Philemon was praying that his faith might continue to be effective on behalf of others (Philem. 6). Clearly, Philemon would need prayer for strength when he met Onesimus, who had dishonored him. By providing thanks and prayers, Paul established a rapport, preparing Philemon and other hearers to accept his counsel concerning the crisis that would challenge their spiritual advance.

Paul knew that the sharing of Philemon's faith had resulted in Christian community (v. 6). The word used here (koinōnia) is generally translated "fellowship" or "partnership" and refers to believers enjoying all aspects of life together because of their common faith and heritage in Christ. As believers share, their effectiveness and fruitfulness increase by epignōsis ("knowledge," "recognition," or "understanding") that every good thing (agathos; "useful, beneficial") that is ours comes from our common union in Christ (v. 6).

Paul wanted Philemon's actions of love and forgiveness to increase. He intimated to Philemon that his coming request would be a spiritual opportunity. Since Philemon's faith and love had already resulted in fellowship, if he responded positively to the spiritual challenge to forgive Onesimus, the ripple effect would be extraordinary: deeper koinōnia and a better understanding of every good thing available in Christ. The community had already experienced joy and paraklēsis ("encouragement" or "comfort") in Philemon's demonstration of love (v. 7). Now, his character was to be tested. He would be asked to love, forgive, and be reconciled with one who had publicly wronged him. With the previous words of recognition, commendation, and affirmation, Paul paved the way for his appeal on behalf of Onesimus.

Paul's Appeal to Philemon

The appeal is based on three spiritual realities: the indwelling work of the Holy Spirit; recognition of Philemon's own dependence on God's forgiveness; and acknowledgment that Philemon was his spiritual child and owed him a debt of love and respect. Paul's desire and intention were that Philemon welcome Onesimus back as an equal (see v. 17).

Paul did not command or order Philemon, even though he could have done so using his apostolic authority (v. 8; cf. 2 Cor. 11:22–33). Instead, he appealed (Philem. 9) to his age and the respect that should come with it and to his sufferings for Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 11:23–30). By now, Paul was approximately sixty years old, in an era when anyone over fifty was considered old. His request was clearly expressed: Paul appealed (parakaleō; "to exhort," "to encourage") to Philemon for his "child" Onesimus, taking the position of a subordinate and asking Philemon to graciously forgive and receive Onesimus as a brother in Christ. The appeal was based on love.

It was after writing a third of the letter that Paul finally raised the issue of Onesimus (v. 10). In the Greek, he doesn't mention Onesimus's name until the end of the sentence. Paul's reference to Onesimus as his "son" or "child" implies that he was instrumental in the conversion of Onesimus, preferring to introduce him as his son in the faith and not as Philemon's slave. Paul does not provide the details of Onesimus's conversion; he simply refers to its reality.

In a creative play on words, Paul notes that Onesimus ("profitable") was unprofitable or useless prior to his conversion, but upon his conversion he revealed traits of character that made him profitable and useful to both Paul and Philemon (v. 11). The timing for Onesimus's return coincided with Paul's desire to dispatch Tychicus to deliver letters to churches in Asia Minor, namely, Colossians and Ephesians (v. 12). Onesimus agreed to voluntarily accompany Tychicus (Col. 4:7–9) back to Colossae and to meet with Philemon—an act signifying His deep faith in God. For Paul, Onesimus is his "heart" (splanchnon; "the inward organs"), indicating the deep ties of love uniting them. Paul was sacrificing himself by returning him. He appreciated the services of Onesimus and would have gladly retained him as his assistant in Rome. However, Paul's ethics would not allow him to do this. He wanted something even better for Onesimus and Philemon. So he told Philemon that he did not want to do anything without his consent (v. 14).

Paul's Advocacy for Onesimus

The word tacha ("perhaps," "maybe") suggests that Onesimus's situation involved more than meets the eye. Just as God brought something wonderful out of Joseph being sold into slavery (see Gen. 50:19–20), so the incident with Onesimus was also possibly being used in the divine economy for a greater good. Paul suggests it was God's providential way of enlightening the church on the subject of forgiveness and the means to secure Onesimus's eternal salvation.

Verse 16 may be considered the climax of the letter. Paul seems to be saying to Philemon: "You love me, so I am asking you to receive Onesimus—not as a slave but as a beloved brother—even as you would receive me." Paul knew Philemon had legal right to take punitive action against Onesimus. However, on the basis of the love of Christ, respect and affection for Paul, and a recognition of the implications of Onesimus's conversion, Paul challenged Philemon to forgive and accept Onesimus as a brother in every sense of the word. Paul recognized that both Onesimus and Philemon were his spiritual sons and that they were spiritual brothers whose well-being was important to him. Consequently, Paul appealed boldly to Philemon based on sociological and christological principles (cf. Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:11–22).

Paul suspected that the situation of Onesimus constituted a testing of Philemon's faith. His request was based on the fellowship Philemon enjoyed with him—to receive and welcome Onesimus as he would receive and welcome Paul himself (v. 17). This would publicly demonstrate God's saving grace in the community at large. When Paul asked for Onesimus's emancipation, he was doing so in a way that would solidify Philemon's honor and integrity in the church. This would constitute a spiritual breakthrough and create immeasurable good.

Paul further told Philemon that Onesimus was his brother in Christ, and even though Philemon was indebted to Paul, nevertheless if Onesimus had wronged (adikeō; "to act unjustly or wickedly") him or if there was any outstanding debt, it should be ellogaō ("charged") to Paul's account (v. 18). Someone should pay for the damage done, but it would not be Onesimus; Paul, following the example of Jesus, was ready to do it for him (see 2 Cor. 8:9; Gal. 3:13). Paul reaffirmed his willingness to take on the debt, saying that he was writing with his own hand, and that he would repay (apotinō; "to pay off in its entirety") anything that Onesimus owed Philemon. He used the language of a promissory note, saying that he was signing with his "own hand" that he would take responsibility for Onesimus's debts. This passage beautifully mirrors Christ's redemptive work for the sinner (see Rom. 5:6–11). In similar fashion, Paul asked Philemon to see Onesimus not as guilty but as guiltless and debt-free.

The acceptance and forgiveness of Onesimus would fill Paul with joy; it would benefit and be useful to him and would greatly refresh (anapauō; "to revive") him (Philem. 20). Philemon had "refreshed" (v. 7) the hearts of the saints, and it was time now to refresh Paul. In v. 20, Paul indicates that whatever Christians do should be based on or determined by their union with God through Christ—"in the Lord," "in Christ." Paul was confident that Philemon would do even more than he had requested (v. 21). That is to say, Philemon would accept Onesimus back in full Christian fellowship and most probably grant Onesimus his legal freedom. Here, Paul clearly implies the qualities and principles of Christian equality. Full fellowship in Christ within the community of believers breaks down social and ethnic barriers. The slave would now be their equal. Paul then spoke of unconditional friendship and created a subtle accountability by expressing his desire to visit and fellowship with Philemon, requesting that a guest room be prepared for him (v. 22). By doing this, he reaffirmed his relationship with Philemon and simultaneously imposed a sense of accountability in regard to the Onesimus matter.

Paul's Farewell

It was common for Paul to end his letters by passing on greetings from those who ministered with him. Here was a band of five additional witnesses who were consonant with Paul's appeal and counted on Philemon and the church at Colossae to respond positively to Onesimus. Epaphras, one of Paul's converts and founder of the church in Colossae, was a compatriot of Philemon and a leader who traveled to Rome to inform Paul of the doctrinal challenges in Colossae (cf. Col. 1:4–8; 4:12–13; see Acts 19:1–3). The inclusion on the list of Mark (i.e., John Mark), whom the Colossians knew (Col. 4:10), illustrated that Paul had successfully worked through issues of forgiveness himself. John Mark had defected from Paul's first missionary journey due to hardship, and therefore Paul did not take him on his second missionary journey. However, it is clear that he had repaired relations with John Mark and had reinstituted him on his ministry team (cf. Acts 15:36–40; 2 Tim. 4:11). Aristarchus, a Macedonian from Thessalonica, had been a companion of Paul on several missionary journeys (cf. Acts 19:29; 27:2; Col. 4:10). Demas was a capable worker at this time but later deserted Paul and the ministry for the attractions of the world (2 Tim. 4:9–10). Luke, Paul's personal physician, was a faithful traveling companion and author of the Gospel of Luke and Acts.

Paul's letter closes with a prayer and blessing (v. 25). The plural "your" is used: once again Philemon and the members of the church in Colossae are included in the dispensing of grace (cf. v. 3) so that they might be stimulated to fulfill the intent of this letter, which at its core is a message of the hope of reconciliation.

HEBREWS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. Among Greek manuscripts for the first thousand years of church history, the only title associated with this epistle—when one is supplied—is simply "To Hebrews" (pros Hebraious). It is unlikely that this title is original, however. There are early manuscripts where no title is given, and there is also nothing in the epistle that affirms such a specific designation. It was likely the result of an inference made by an early scribe. In later manuscripts the title was expanded to "The Epistle to the Hebrews" or, more commonly, "The Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews." Some later manuscripts even include historical statements at the end of the title: "written from Rome," "written from Italy through Timothy," or even "written to the ones in Jerusalem." While it is unlikely that any of these titles were originally part of the epistle, they do reveal the way in which it was perceived within the church.

Strictly speaking, the Epistle to the Hebrews is anonymous. Unlike other letters within the NT, the author chose not to identify himself. In fact, the only Christian identified by name in the entire letter is Timothy, who the author says has been recently released from prison (13:23). The letter's anonymity led to speculation about the identity of its author as early as the second century. In the A.D. 190s, Clement of Alexandria concluded that Paul wrote the document in the Hebrew language and that Luke translated it into Greek. Others within the early church attributed it to Barnabas, while still others preferred Luke or Clement of Rome. Origen, the early third-century Christian scholar and philosopher from Alexandria, Egypt, left the matter open ended, saying, "But who wrote the epistle, in truth, God knows."

It was this lack of certainty about its authorship—combined with the fact that attention was given to the OT—that made some feel the book was more Jewish than Christian, resulting in Hebrews being one of the last books to be included in the NT canon. For a book to be considered canonical, it had to be written by an apostle or by someone closely associated with an apostle (like Luke or Mark). It was only after the Pauline authorship of Hebrews was acknowledged that the letter found universal acceptance—though many continued, and still continue, to question the mysterious identity of its author.

While there is much we do not know about the author, some things are certain. The letter clearly indicates that the author was a Greek-speaking Christian who had a formal education and was a skilled communicator. It reveals a compelling use of images, complex arguments, and the hand of a person highly proficient in the Greek language. The author was thoroughly acquainted with the OT and its sacrificial system, yet recognized that Jesus was the climax to which it all pointed. In fact, no other document in the NT quotes the OT as often as Hebrews. Finally, and above all else, the author was a pastor at heart. The sole purpose of the letter was to encourage its readers to remain faithful to Jesus amidst persecution and hardship.

The question of the authorship of Hebrews is of particular interest to Seventh-day Adventists. This is because Ellen G. White, who we believe received the gift of prophecy, occasionally attributes the book to the Apostle Paul. Since Pauline authorship was the traditional perspective at the time, one should be careful not to attribute too much significance to what may simply be incidental references. This is important since at other times she simply refers to the author as "the apostle"; but this could also be a reference to Paul.

Those who favor the Pauline authorship of Hebrews face major, but not insuperable, difficulties. First, the Greek of Hebrews is unlike that in any of Paul's other letters. Moreover, the author does not refer to himself as one of the apostles (2:3–4; 13:6–7). And he also uses terms like "law" and "faith" in ways that are different from what we find in Romans and Galatians.

While these difficulties should not be lightly set aside, it must also be remembered that we know very little about the process that led to Paul's writings. On occasion, the apostle wrote in his own hand (Gal. 6:11), while at other times he dictated his letters, allowing a scribe or amanuensis some degree of freedom in actually doing the writing (Rom. 16:22). Furthermore, the letters that carry Paul's name show considerable variation in style and subject matter, as can be seen when comparing the style of the letters to the Romans and the Galatians with the style of the letters to the Corinthians or to Timothy and Titus. It seems likely that Paul's terminology and style would vary based on his audience and subject matter. It would also be difficult to find a person other than Paul within the early church who had such insights into the OT sacrificial system and the new era that had been inaugurated by the coming of Jesus of Nazareth.

But in the end, Hebrews is anonymous—although of apostolic origin. Hebrews is a magnificent document that has enriched God's people in all ages. It unquestionably bears the stamp of inspiration and, as we seek to understand and heed its great ideas, we shall be abundantly rewarded.

Date. It is unlikely that Hebrews was written before A.D. 60. The letter makes it clear that the recipients had been part of the Christian community for an extended period of time after the death of Jesus (Heb. 2:3; 5:12; 10:32), and during that time some church leaders (13:7) had passed away. On the other hand, the sustained references to the superiority of the new covenant over the old covenant—with its earthly sanctuary and endless sacrifices offered year after year (8:13; 10:1-2)—strongly suggest it had to have been written before the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Besides, if the sacrifices of the temple had actually ceased, as they did when the Romans destroyed the temple, it is hard to imagine that the author would not have mentioned it, since it would have proved his point. Paul was arrested and executed very late in A.D. 66 or sometime in 67. If he is the author, Hebrews would have been written in the early to mid A.D. 60s.

Backgrounds. A careful study of Hebrews reveals a clear spiritual profile of the Christians it was originally written to reach. They were not members of a recently planted congregation because, although they had had sufficient time to grow in Christian understanding, they were still spiritual infants (5:11-14). They could recall the preaching of the apostles and the miracles associated with the gifts of the Holy Spirit (2:3-4). Previously, they had suffered insults, persecution, and confiscation of their property; when some of their fellow believers had been imprisoned for Christ, they stood with them (10:32-34). They had begun, however, to grow weary in the Christian way. The years had rolled on and Jesus had not come back (10:35-37). They felt like drifting away (2:1). Unbelief had begun to take root (3:13-16). Some had quit attending church (10:25), and some may even have publicly renounced Christ (6:4-6; 10:26-31; 12:15-17).

The apostle's solution to the spiritual state of the Hebrew Christians corresponds to the problem. He exhorted them to stay alert (2:1), to hold on firmly (3:6, 14; 4:14), to persist (4:11), to focus on Jesus (3:1), to encourage one another (3:13; 10:25), to remember earlier times (10:32), and to endure (10:36; 12:1). One quality stands out above all others: faith. Faith characterized the lives of both Jesus and Moses (3:2); lack of faith led to Israel's failure (4:2). The heroes of old overcame physical hardships and conquered temptations through faith (11:1-39), and so could the apostle's readers.

Hebrews bears almost none of the usual marks of a letter: the writer does not identify himself or the intended recipients, nor does he include the usual introductory greeting or discuss personal matters. Rather than addressing a series of concerns, the document develops, from the outset, as a carefully planned theological argument. The writer describes the work as a "word of exhortation" (13:22) and periodically injects homiletic applications into the theological discourse. The Book of Hebrews is, therefore, more like a written sermon than an epistle.

While the author includes greetings from people in Italy at the conclusion of the letter (13:24), the phrase is inconclusive. It could mean that the document was written either from Italy (presumably Rome) or to Italy. Some have suggested Jerusalem as the likely destination for the letter, due to its repeated references to the sacrifices of the temple. While that makes sense to some degree, it is far from conclusive since Jews scattered all across the Roman Empire looked to Jerusalem and its temple with admiration. Thus, while the circumstances in the church that led to the letter being written are fairly clear, its provenance and destination remain just as mysterious as the identity of its author.

Theology and Purpose. Jesus, magnificent in person and work, dominates the thought patterns of Hebrews. He is the Captain or Pioneer who has passed over life's course of suffering and temptation (2:10; 12:2); He is also the Apostle of our faith who was sent to earth for us (3:1) and the Forerunner who has gone on ahead to the heavenly courts (6:20).

1. Unified Theology. The book of Hebrews is a marvel and a mystery. On one hand, it is a superbly wrought piece of literature—composed carefully and executed beautifully. Here, students of the original Greek encounter many words that do not occur in any other book of the NT and a few that cannot be found elsewhere in the literature of the times. Some of the NT books bear evidence of having been written in haste—Galatians is a notable example, put together in white heat by a deeply troubled Paul—but not Hebrews. Its leading ideas are briefly introduced in turn, then developed and, at length, rounded off.

Yet this literary masterpiece is built of ideas—priest, temples, and sacrifices—that seem remote to modern thinking, especially that of Protestants. The reasoning in some parts of the book is dense, with ideas seemingly difficult to grasp: the description of the ancient priest, King Melchizedek, as being without father, mother, genealogy, beginning of days, or end of life (7:3); or the patriarch Levi, before he was born, paying tithe to Melchizedek through his ancestor Abraham (7:9-10).

In studying Hebrews, it is critically important to listen to the text, allowing the Holy Spirit to disclose the author's meaning. The reader should begin with the opening words—where the argumentation immediately starts—and move forward with the writer. To plunge into a passage of the book without having journeyed with the author is to invite lack of comprehension and confusion of thought. Hebrews was written whole and is to be understood as a whole.

2. Jesus as High Priest and Sacrifice. The predominant focus in Hebrews is the portrayal of Jesus as our great High Priest. Elsewhere in Scripture we find the idea alluded to or suggested, but in Hebrews it is developed and expanded. The theology of the first seven chapters focuses on this theme, concluding with the declaration of 8:1 that the main point of the book is that Jesus is our High Priest "at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty" of heaven. Jesus as High Priest is superior to any and all other priests. Because He is both God and man, He constitutes the bridge between heaven and earth. Unlike the Aaronic high priests, who were sinful and mortal, He is holy, innocent, separated from sinners (7:26) and lives forever.

Jesus is not only High Priest—He is also God's all-sufficient sacrifice for our sins. By dying on the cross, He provided what the multiplied sacrifices of Israel's sanctuary system could never accomplish: a final solution to the age-old sin problem. One no longer needs to bring a lamb or a goat as an offering for his or her sins, for complete atonement has been made by the once-for-all sacrifice on Calvary. Jesus's sacrifice was once for all time—forever effective with no need of being repeated (10:12). Under the old system, only the high priest could enter the Most Holy Place of the sanctuary, and on just one day each year: the Day of Atonement. Jesus, however, broke down all barriers between heaven and earth by his sacrifice. By faith, every believer may now enter the very presence of God (4:16). What a portrayal of our Lord! If those early Christians could have but grasped the magnificence of His person and work, they would have been rejuvenated and would have determined never to give up or turn back to the world. Not surprisingly, a key word of Hebrews is often translated "better" or "superior." We read of a better name (1:4), a better hope (7:19), a better covenant (7:22), a better ministry (8:6), better promises (8:6), better sacrifices (9:23), a better country (11:16), and better blood (12:24).

While Jesus as High Priest and sacrifice are the ruling motifs of Hebrews, we also find several other theological ideas of note: full assurance in Jesus (10:19-22), the seriousness of neglecting or rejecting such a great salvation (2:3; 6:4-6; 10:26-31; 12:15-17), the Sabbath (3:6—4:11), the Christian life as a pilgrimage (11:13-16), faith (11:1-40), and the Second Coming (9:27-28; 10:25-37; 12:26).

3. A Message of Hope for Today. Hebrews is startlingly relevant to Christians in our time. When faith has grown cold and the world seems so alluring, this book will turn our eyes back to Jesus. Our security and our hope are in Him alone. If we have grown tired of waiting and every vision seems to have failed, Hebrews assures us that divine history did not come to an end at the cross. Heaven is still actively working out our salvation. Jesus ministers in the heavenly sanctuary. One day His work will be over and He will come back for those who eagerly wait for Him (9:28).

Hebrews holds special significance for Seventh-day Adventists. We look to it for key support for our unique doctrine of the heavenly sanctuary. That doctrine is a construct built principally on four books of the Bible: Leviticus in the OT, with Hebrews as its counterpart; and Daniel, with Revelation as its counterpart. In Hebrews, the typological function of sacrifice, priesthood, mediation, and temple find their fulfillment in Christ. Throughout Christian history, devout men and women have found here the grandest ideas and the loftiest conceptions, but above all a portrait of Jesus as High Priest in the heavenly temple, as a sacrifice, and as Coming King—unmatched in power and beauty.

COMMENTARY

1:1—7:28

JESUS OUR GREAT HIGH PRIEST

The motif of Jesus as High Priest dominates the first seven chapters of Hebrews. Although the term "High Priest" does not appear until 2:17, the developing ideas prepare for this disclosure. The apostle argues for a high Christology in which the word "Son" is paramount. His use of this term and the accompanying reasoning force the conclusion that the Son is everything God is. But, after sharing this exalted nature of Jesus, the author presents Him as starkly human—suffering, tempted, crying out to the Father for help. This portrayal of Jesus as truly God but also truly man climaxes in the affirmation that therefore He is our merciful and faithful High Priest (2:17–18; 4:14–15). Events in time play a crucial role. Jesus, rather than eternally being High Priest, became High Priest. He qualified to be High Priest by becoming human. In three places, the theological exposition is interrupted by exhortations: 2:1–4; 3:6b—4:16; 5:11—6:20. These passages, which encourage the Hebrew Christians to hold firmly to their faith, all flow from the arguments for the magnificence of Jesus that the apostle will present.

The Better Revelation

The first four verses of Hebrews are more than an introduction to the document. In masterful fashion, they summarize the major theological ideas that will be developed. They are a brief overture, sounding in rapid succession themes that will later be addressed. These lines also set the tone of the writing—their measured, rolling cadences immediately take us into the presence of the God who speaks and acts. The passage develops in two parts. The first, vv. 1–2a, has God as its subject—the God who speaks; the second, vv. 2b–4, center on the Son—the climactic Speech of God.

In v. 1, we confront the God who spoke. The apostle makes no attempt to prove that God exists, nor does he try to establish the fact of divine self-revelation. He presupposes both, merely reminding us of the OT conception of God. We are not alone in an insensate universe. Beyond our pain of emptiness, of alien space, is God. He is not found by experimentation in the lab, nor can He be "proved" by philosophical reasoning. God is before all and beyond all, but does not remain in splendid isolation. He comes to His creation continually, revealing Himself. He speaks.

The author's mention of the various times and ways in which God has spoken reminds us of the OT stories of God. In the Garden, to Abraham, by the terebinths of Mamre, to Moses in the desert, to the Hebrews in Egyptian bondage, to David as a shepherd boy, and to the young urbanite Isaiah—Yahweh came. In a thousand circumstances and a multitude of ways, He came. Because He is the speaking God, He revealed Himself over and over.

The lines of vv. 1–2 are carefully balanced. There are exact correspondences between the old revelation and the new:

The Speaking God

The Old Testament	The New Testament
Spoke	Has spoken
In the past	In these last days
To the fathers/ ancestors	To us
By the prophets	By His Son

Only the phrase about many various times and ways finds no counterpart. In the original, the omission comes with greater effect because these words are placed at the very beginning. The construction suggests a strong contrast between the old revelation and the new. The old came in fragmentary, episodic fashion—here a little, there a little—and, as a result, was incomplete, partial, and imperfect. But the new comes in one climactic speech of God the Father, at one time, in one person: His Son. With Jesus, all the revelation of God from the OT is gathered up and surpassed.

The Son dominates the second part of the passage. With the introduction of His name, He moves into the limelight, and God the Father recedes. In rapid strokes, the apostle gives us a sketch of His person and a summary of His work. The name "Son" is significant. It is this that designates Him superior to angels, as shown by a comparison of vv. 4, 5. In each place where this term is used of Him in the document, it carries heavy weight, pointing to the special nature of the Person. "Son" suggests a preexistent quality of being. In Hebrews, "Son" indicates revelation with finality (1:2), superiority to angels (1:5–14), qualification for the new and better priesthood (5:4–6; 7:20), and One whom we are warned not to despise (6:6; 10:29).

Ellen White affirms the divine connotations of the term "Son." "Christ is the pre-existent, self-existent Son of God. . . . He is the eternal, self-existent Son" (Ev 615). However, while asserting the eternal Sonship, she suggests that the incarnation made Him Son in a different way. "While the Son of a human being, He became the Son of God in a new sense. Thus He stood in our world—the Son of God, yet allied by birth to the human race" (1SM 226).

The superiority suggested by the pregnant term "Son" is now spelled out: He is the apaugasma of God's glory and the charaktēr of His being (1:3). The first metaphorical term (apaugasma) denotes radiance, brightness, a shining forth, or an effulgence. The Son is the shining forth of the glory of God. The second term (charaktēr) is drawn from the seal that reproduces its likeness on wax. What God is, the Son is. Furthermore, the Son does not become the divine ray or inherit the divine nature. He was that way at Creation and Incarnation, as shown by the Greek ōn, from the verb of being.

This is an exalted conception of Jesus—a high Christology. Only the grand opening words of the Gospel of John (John 1:1–18) approach it in the status assigned to the Person of Christ. The Son's Person is matched only by His work. That work falls into three phases in time: preincarnate, incarnate, and postincarnate (Heb. 1:1b–4).

- Preincarnate: He was the agent of creation (v. 2), and He sustains all things (v. 3).
- Incarnate: He accomplished purification for sins (v. 3).
- Postincarnate: He is regnant (v. 4) and appointed heir of all things (v. 2).

The earthly life of the Son is encompassed in a handful of words. Birth, miracles, teachings—all are passed over. Only one accomplishment is brought into light here: He Himself accomplished purification for sins. That work, the apostle tells us, was fully achieved: He sat down, signifying a completed task. This idea, so briefly mentioned here, will be expatiated in 8:2–10, where the apostle focuses on Jesus as our all-sufficient sacrifice for sins.

The passage closes on a regnant note. As the Son is Lord of space—bringing all things into being and upholding them—so He is also Lord of time. He sits in exaltation at the place of heavenly favor, superior to angelic beings. That sitting, that exaltation, is a guarantee that, in due time, the universe will find its ultimate place in Him. God has appointed Him heir of all things. All things, once begun by Him, will at last return to Him. That time, however, is in the future. Now, only in the church is Christ acknowledged as Lord; the promise of heirship guarantees a universal acclamation in God's time. We, His followers, are in a waiting time—a time of preparation (10:12–13; cf. 1:13).

1:5—2:18

The Better Name

This section falls into three distinct parts: 1:5–14, where the Son's superiority to angels is stressed; 2:1–4, a break in the exposition for the first homiletic application; and 2:5–18, a discussion of the Son's life on earth as a human. Throughout, the Person of the Son is the ruling interest. That personhood gives Him a status denied to any angel, it leads to warning about neglecting the salvation He has brought, and it is in no sense denied by the incarnation, when He became, for a while, less than the angels.

1:5–14. The Son Better than the Angels. By a series of OT citations, the apostle elaborates the point of the greater excellence and superiority of the name of the Son, which he introduced in 1:4. He sees the OT, in its entirety, pointing to the Messiah. Thus, he finds allusions to the Son in the royal psalms concerning Israel's king's adoption as Yahweh's son (Ps. 2:7), in Him being praised (Ps. 45:6–7) and crowned (Ps. 110:1), in Yahweh's promise to David about his successors (2 Sam. 7:12–16), and in the prayer of the afflicted person (Ps. 102:25–27). The apostle is dependent for these applications upon the Greek text of the OT—commonly referred to as the Septuagint (LXX)—rather than the Hebrew, which differs significantly in some of the citations.

The series of quotations argues for the Son's superiority to angels in four steps. First, the name "Son" is predicated only of Him. God never called an angel "Son," but He thus addressed Christ in Psalm 2:7 and 2 Samuel 7:14. Second, angels are to worship the Son. Here the author cites the LXX of Deuteronomy 32:43. Third, the Son and angels have different natures. Angels are "winds" and a "fiery flame" (Ps. 104:4, LXX), but the Son is directly addressed as God, whose throne will last forever and who is exalted above all (Heb. 1:8). Here, Psalm 45:6–7 is quoted for support. Further, the Son is the eternal, unchanging one. All else grows old and fades away, but He is the same for all time. Here, the apostle cites Psalm 102:25–27. Finally, the Son and the angels have contrasting service. On one hand, the Son reigns at God's right hand—the place of honor. On the other, the angels are "ministering spirits" (Heb. 1:14) sent out to serve the people of God.

The apostle regards the OT highly. For him, a word from Scripture is the end of discussion—the clincher in a theological argument. Scripture, regardless of who the original speaker in the OT setting may have been, delivers the very word of God. Thus, although in Psalms 45 and 102 the statement quoted by the author is from a human suppliant, the apostle puts the quoted words directly in the mouth of God. In this view of Scripture, God speaks directly and immediately to the reader. It is a perspective that will be maintained throughout the rest of the book, and one that Bible lovers still experience as they study the word.

Angels in Hebrews

The long string of quotations in 1:5–14 suggests that the apostle felt compelled to drive home to his readers the Son's superiority to angels. Studies of the background to the NT period give strong indication of a deep interest in angels. We know from Paul's letter to the church at Colossae that some Christians were troubled by ideas of angel-worship (Col. 2:18). Non-biblical literature—especially that associated with Jewish apocalyptic—also indicates angelic speculation and veneration, sometimes centering in angelic ministry in a heavenly temple. A scroll from Qumran assigns even the figure of Melchizedek a role of heavenly mediation. This sort of thinking may be behind the author's warnings in Hebrews about strange doctrines (13:9). Thus from the outset, the author—arguing for the superiority of the Christian faith—went to some lengths to establish that angels are inferior to the Son by reason of name, status, and service.

An exalted Christology emerges. Whereas in Hebrews 1:3 the apostle already placed the Son in the closest conceptual relationship to deity without calling Him God, here, the equation is explicitly made: "Your throne, O God . . ." (1:8). Nowhere else in Hebrews does the writer return to the height he touches here, preferring instead to work with the "Son" terminology.

The point of the argument in 1:5–14—that the Son is greater than angels—leads directly into the warning in 2:1–4. The reasoning is from the lesser to the greater: if the revelation that came through angels carried a threat of punishment on the transgressor, how much more will be the retribution that comes with the greater revelation through the Son?

2:1–4. The First Exhortation. The writer selected the high point of OT revelation—Sinai—to make the contrast with the salvation provided by Christ. Although the account in Exodus does not mention angels, other passages of Scripture indicate their presence (Deut. 33:2; Gal. 3:19). Thus, the author drew the contrast: that which was spoken through angels (Heb. 2:2) against that which was spoken through the Lord (v. 3)—who from the context is Jesus. This word was also attested by the apostles and was accompanied by manifestations of the Spirit through signs, wonders, and miracles (v. 4). The exhortation is shaped by a strong warning: how shall we escape? (v. 3). The implied answer is that we have no way to escape divine retribution if we neglect that which has come with so much greater revelation than was previously revealed.

The verb translated "drift away" (v. 1) is a nautical term. Like a ship whose anchor drags in the night or is imperceptibly pulled off course by wind and currents, we may find ourselves far from the harbor of the Son's salvation. The verb may also be used for the ring that slips unnoticed from a finger. Hence, there is an earnest call to pay the closest attention (v. 1). If we want to hold course to so great a salvation (v. 3), we must not take it for granted. When that which is most precious to us is treated casually or simply neglected, we suffer great loss.

2:5–18. The Son Lower than the Angels. To the argument about the Son's superiority to angels, readers might raise a strong objection: if the Son is greater than angels, how do we account for His human experiences, when He clearly was lower than the angels, especially on the cross? The exposition of 2:5–18 takes up this issue. We find a response that moves from apologetic to constructive. The writer first defends the Son's inferiority to angels as a temporary phase, then he argues that His human experiences were necessary in the divine plan. By becoming man—by suffering and being tested and dying—the Son destroyed death and qualified to become our great High Priest.

In vv. 5–9, the author appeals to the OT for support. He quoted Psalm 8:4–6, where the Son of Man became lower than the angels. In its original setting, the psalm is a hymn to the glory of humanity, who is only slightly less than God. Some scholars see its use here as a messianic prophecy of Christ fulfilling the original divine purpose of the dominion of humanity over creation (Gen. 1:26–28). However, v. 9 picks up the words of the psalm and applies them to Jesus—made lower than the angels and later crowned with glory and honor. That is, Scripture already portrayed the Son's career of descent and exaltation.

The argument thus far is apologetic. Are the Son's human experiences, which mark Him as inferior to angels, a problem? The OT had already predicted them. And that same Scripture foretold that they would be only for a little while. The Son, greater than angels, became their inferior for a short time but is again crowned with glory and honor. All things, at last, are to be put in subjection under his feet.

The final part of v. 9 contains two items of interest. First, a large number of church fathers—as well as a few other Greek manuscripts and early translations of the NT—suggest a different translation to the majority reading "by the grace of God" (see below, "The Interpretation of Hebrews 2:9"). Second, the apostle's words regarding Christ tasting death point to the full experience of dying. Chrysostom, the great preacher of the early church, held that Christ's "tasting" death was like a physician who takes a sip of a bitter potion before handing it to his patient. In this instance, the famous homiletician badly missed the mark; Hebrews sets forth Jesus's death as a terrible, grim reality. He didn't merely sip the cup; He drained it to its dregs.

The death of Jesus was not a temporary thwarting of the Son's career. It was because Jesus tasted a desolating death that He could subsequently be crowned with glory and honor. And the experience of death into which He fully entered brought with it universal benefits. It was for everyone—a saving death for the whole world.

The writer of Hebrews presents the death of Jesus as very important. He refers to it in many places, and it forms the high point of the theological argument in 9:1—10:18. There, the ideas first sketched in 2:5–18 come to full expression.

Verses 10–13 emphasize the reality of Jesus's humanity. The leading word is adelphos ("brother," which connotes either a man or a woman—brother or sister). Because the Son became human, He is not ashamed of us—we are His brothers and sisters. The apostle cited three passages from the OT to support this point. The first quotation comes from Psalm 22:22, the psalm that includes several messianic references, including the despairing cry from the cross ("My God . . ."). The second citation derives either from Isaiah 8:17 or Psalm 18:2. The third reference comes from Isaiah 8:18. In its original context, it applied to Isaiah and his sons; however, as we have already seen, the meaning of inspired texts reaches beyond the original setting revealing a deeper meaning.

In Hebrews 2:10, we find a statement about God that is without parallel in the NT: that it was fitting or appropriate for Him to act as He did. Everywhere else, God is never called into question—He is above considerations of appropriateness. The statement here is in the context of the human experiences of Jesus, especially those involving suffering. God, as the source and end of all things, purposed the sufferings of Christ so that He might be the archēgos

The Interpretation of Hebrews 2:9

As indicated, a large number of both Eastern and Western church fathers and a number of Greek manuscripts and early translations of the NT include a variant reading that involves the change of just a few Greek letters but produces the result "without God" (chōris theou) instead of "by the grace of God" (chariti theou). While unlikely original, this sharp shift in meaning suggests the recognition of the loneliness Jesus experienced on the cross. It is a picture that we find again in 5:7–8: Jesus cried out with loud entreaties and tears to be saved from death. This stark scene is matched only by Jesus's prayer in Gethsemane and by the cry of dereliction from the cross regarding why God had forsaken Him (Mark 15:34).

("captain") of salvation for suffering humanity. This term has the idea of a pioneer or pathfinder. It is translated variously as "captain," "founder," "pioneer," or "source." It is the same term, sometimes translated as "author," which is used in 12:2 regarding Jesus.

The apostle tells us that the Son was made perfect through sufferings. He speaks of this idea in two other places (5:9; 7:28). The idea does not imply that Jesus was raised to a divine status that He did not previously have; Hebrews 1:1-3 and 5-14 clearly rule this out. Nor does he mean that the Son had a personal problem of sin that had to be removed by His own suffering. Elsewhere, the author specifically predicates the sinlessness of the Son (4:15; 7:26-28). Rather, the perfecting motif indicates a maturing—a preparation for divine work. That is, the human experiences of the Son qualify or equip Him for the role laid out in the divine purpose. The role of His humanity becomes clear in 2:7-18. The suffering motif features prominently in Hebrews (2:10, 15; 5:7-8; 9:26; 13:12). In almost every case, the discussion focuses on the death of Jesus, not on the general human condition of heartaches, sicknesses, tragedies, and grief. Jesus's death was marked by intense suffering as it accomplished the divine will.

Hebrews 2:10-13 highlights the reality of the Son's humanity. His closeness to us is underscored in the pregnant term "one" (v. 11). It points to Jesus's commonality with us, because He became truly human. In vv. 14-18, we see four benefits that flow from the Son's becoming human and, for a little while, lower that the angels.

First, Christ—by taking flesh and blood—entered into the dreaded experience of death and thereby destroyed it (v. 14). The Son had to become human in order to die and in so doing destroy the kingdom of death from within. Jesus's victory over death accomplished more than giving Christians hope for a future existence. It releases those who, throughout their lives, are held captive to their fear of death (v. 15). Unlike the rest of humankind—whose lives are lived under the grim certitude that all their joys, hopes, and dreams will eventually come tumbling down—we who believe know that death is a conquered foe. Death will not—cannot—hold us in its clutches when our little life comes to a close, nor can it keep us as its slaves while we live. Because of Jesus, the Conqueror of death, we no longer fear death.

Second, by becoming human, the Son was qualified to be our great High Priest. He had to be made like His brothers and sisters (v. 17). This indicates divine necessity. An angel could not be our high priest—only One who had passed through the same experiences we do and would thus be both merciful and faithful. These two characteristics will be elaborated in reverse order in 3:1-6 and 4:14—5:10.

As High Priest, Jesus atones for and makes propitiation for the sins of the people (2:17). The apostle will go on to describe the help that Jesus is able to offer us, but he first mentions Christ's atoning work. This work will be the focus of the concluding theological exposition in 8:1—10:18. The word often translated "propitiation" or "atonement" from the Greek conveys the sense of taking away or expiation. The Septuagint uses this word for the covering of the ark of the covenant, on which the blood was sprinkled on the Day of Atonement. Sin is not something light, to be casually forgiven and forgotten. Sin is a terrible weight that no human being can remove. Only God Himself can deal with it. He did and He does—through the sacrifice of Jesus, our great High Priest.

Finally, Jesus, by virtue of His human experiences of temptation and suffering, is able to help those who are tempted (2:18). The help He provides is more than empathetic understanding of our struggles—it is overcoming help (see 4:14-16). He who went through the fires of testing and emerged unscathed comes to the aid of His people as they go through the same fires.

In one glorious passage, Hebrews 1:5—2:18, the apostle has sketched the career of the Son. It is a passage that reaches sublime heights as Christ is addressed as God but also one that sees Him having become lower than angels, having suffered, having been tempted, and having died. In the divine economy, nothing happens by chance. All unfolds as the outworking of the plan to rescue lost humanity. At center stage in this drama of the ages we see Jesus—He who is eternally and truly God, He whom angels worship and obey at His bidding—having humbled Himself to become truly one with us. What a contrast—from highest heaven to earth's lowest point! But what a victory—over death, over the fear of death! And so, truly God and now truly man, He has become our High Priest, making expiation for our sins, ministering mercifully and faithfully on our behalf, and supplying overcoming help in our sufferings and temptations.

Inheriting a Better Promise

In 3:1-6, the apostle compares and contrasts Christ and Moses, both of whom are termed faithful. In 3:7-19, he highlights the experience of Israel in the wilderness as a warning to his readers. They failed because of unbelief (apistia). Then, 4:1-13 contains the writer's exhortation to his readers to have faith so that they may obtain the promised rest. Throughout 3:1—4:13, the key word is pistis ("faith"). The adjective pistos ("faithful") and the negative apistia ("unfaith" or "unbelief") derive from it. Pistis and its two cognates structure the three parts of the section.

3:1-6. Christ, the Faithful High Priest. Hebrews 3:1-6 opens with a call to consider Jesus as Apostle and High Priest. The early Christians to whom the author was writing were to contemplate the victory that Jesus had achieved. The call is not an encouragement to engage in metaphysical speculation about the Person of Jesus, nor is it an incentive to understand Jesus primarily as an example of Christian conduct and the model for Christians. The discussion of Christology here and throughout the book leads in another direction. Readers are to trust what Jesus has done rather than trying to do what He has done.

The term "High Priest" is a major motif of the document. The term will be developed in chapter 4. This is the only use of "Apostle" for Jesus in the entire NT. Its basic idea is that of sending: an apostolos is one who is sent. The Gospel of John frequently uses language expressing that Jesus is the One who had been sent from God (e.g., John 20:21). In Hebrews 3:1, the term is appropriate in view of the theology of the first two chapters. They argued for the preexistence of the Son and of a temporary break in His exalted state, during which He became human and was lower than the angels. Thus, "Apostle" sums up what has gone before, even as "High Priest" gathers together the theology that will be elaborated through 8:2.

The writer compares Christ and Moses. These leaders have one outstanding trait in common: they were faithful to God. Christ, however, is greater than Moses on four counts:

Christ	Moses
Son	Servant
Builder of the house(hold)	Part of the house(hold)
Over the house(hold)	In the house(hold)
Fulfillment of the Old Testament revelation	Witness to what would be spoken in the future

"House" or "household" refers to the people of God. The view is of two periods of history: that of the Exodus and that of the new exodus involving Christians. The argument prepares the ground for the warning and exhortation that commences in 3:7. Moses is not an important figure in the book of Hebrews. He is listed among the heroes of faith (11:23-24), and again in a vivid passage in the following chapter (12:18-24). Moses's role, as shown in 3:1-6 and 12:18-24, is to stand as a representative of the old covenant sacrificial system. The author of Hebrews continually highlights the superiority of the Christian religion by holding it up against the old system given at Sinai. This point will be emphasized in later comparisons of Christ and Aaron (5:1-10), the priesthood of Christ with the old priesthood (7:1-28), the new covenant with the old (8:6-13), and the new sacrifice—of Christ Himself—with the old system of sacrifices (9:1—10:18).

The apostle is determined to underline the fact that Jesus is a faithful High Priest. He argues that the human experiences of the Son (2:5-15) enabled Him to become a merciful and faithful High Priest (2:17). In 3:1-6, he summarized this point by comparing and contrasting Christ and Moses.

3:7-19. Lessons from Israel's Unfaithfulness. The "if" of v. 6 introduces the second exhortation of Hebrews. In a long passage, the appeal turns from warning in 3:7-19 to encouragement in 4:1-13, as the focus shifts from Israel in the desert to the Christians.

Inclusion among the people of God is not automatic, nor is it independent of human appreciation. Rather, it is to be constantly reiterated by a life of confident steadfastness. The wandering tribes in the desert illustrate that mere inclusion in the chosen people is not sufficient to win the final goal. Inclusion must be accompanied by faith. The apostle bases his warning from Israel's failure on Psalm 95:7-11 rather than from passages in the Pentateuch. His frequent citations from the OT are drawn from the Psalter in preference to any other portion of Scripture. One text, Psalm 110:4, assumes a critical role in the theological presentation; the author cites it frequently in whole or in part (see Heb. 7).

The apostle immediately applies Psalm 95:7-11 to the situation of his readers. In a gigantic leap, he bridges the centuries from the psalm's composition—the word of God confronts Christians in the here and now. They, not the Israelites, are the "you" of the ancient text; the One who warns and exhorts them is the "Holy Spirit," not the psalmist. The exhortation commences with an arresting note of appeal: "today." "Today" is God's eternal now, not to be shunted aside for a more "convenient" time (Acts 24:25). It denotes urgency—a challenge for immediate consideration and response. Every day is that "today" (Heb. 3:13). The urgent appeal and warning lead to a succession of "todays," in which Christian assurance remains unwavering to the end (vv. 14–15). At 4:7, the apostle again invokes the "today" of Psalm 95:7–11—this time not as warning but as an invitation to enter now into the promised rest.

Israel of old failed to heed the warning voice of God. The hearts of the people gradually hardened through the deceptive nature of sin (Heb. 3:13). The hardening of their hearts denotes a refusal to obey—a determination to go their own way. It resulted in acts of rebellion. Thus, it was necessary that the "Hebrews" to whom the apostle wrote be on their guard. It was possible that a slow, insidious change was taking place—toward a wicked, unbelieving heart (v. 12). They might eventually find themselves far from the people of God—apostates having come to this sad place by neglect rather than by design.

The warning parallels the first exhortation of 2:1–4. Both passages describe a carelessness in religion, not overt rejection. Especially in 3:12–15, the exhortation parallels that of 2:3. The expression "the living God" (3:12) carries a note of judgment and retribution similar to the warning "how shall we escape?" (2:3). Elsewhere in Hebrews, "the living God" suggests retribution (10:31; 12:22, 25).

Israel, despite the presence of Yahweh in its midst, failed to enter His rest (3:18). That "rest" was the inheritance of Canaan, toward which they had set out from Egypt. But they had floundered in the desert and failed to attain the promised rest. In a similar manner, the Christian readers may fail to attain God's promised rest defined for them in 4:1–11. Only by heeding the urgent "today" of the Holy Spirit, only by heeding the voice of God through a faithful, persevering life, may they be assured of reaching God's goal for them. So 3:14 again sounds the "if" of v. 6—the warning of possible failure.

The final verses of the chapter focus exclusively on Israel of old (vv. 16–19). Here, we find a further aspect of their failure and a concise statement for its reason. The Israelites all came out of Egypt, led by Moses. They had started well, and they had a faithful leader (vv. 1–6). But they fell short of the goal; they lacked perseverance. Their fault is encapsulated in one word: "unbelief" (apistia; lit. "unfaith"). The point is repeated in 4:2 using "faith" (pistis) instead: the Israelites failed from a lack of faith, all other benefits notwithstanding.

The apostle's study of Israel's failure suggests that faith and its negative counterpart, unbelief, illustrate types of responses to God and His deeds. They suggest two particular mindsets out of which two modes of conduct emerge. Chapter 11 will elaborate the meaning of faith (pistis); unbelief (apistia) is clearly more than a matter of the mind. For the writer of Hebrews, "unbelief" sums up the hardened heart—the person who falls away from God and His goal for him or her. The element of inconsistency—of a lack of perseverance—is much broader than an absence of mental assent.

4:1–13. Invitation to Faithfulness. The apostle next turns from warning to invitation. Urging his readers to take heed of the wilderness generation's failure to enter Canaan, he holds before them the divine promise of rest. "Rest" is the key word throughout the passage. We find the noun eight times (vv. 1, 3, 5, 6, 8, 10, 11), in every case from the Greek word katapausis—the same word used in 3:6–19. In two places, the verb form occurs, also derived from katapausis. At 4:9, we find a different word translated "rest." Instead of katapausis it is sabbatismos. It is of particular interest to Seventh-day Adventists.

The logic of vv. 1–11 is difficult in places; however, we may discern its essential steps. (1) Only two generations are in view: that of Moses and that of Jesus, the latter being the people of God in the apostle's reading audience. (2) The apostle can therefore argue that a promise of entering God's rest remains (v. 1). He reasons this way on the basis of Psalm 95:7–11, arguing that the warning given in Scripture shows that the promise is still unrealized (Heb. 4:8–9). (3) He says it remains for some to enter it (v. 6). The word of God carries with it a divine inevitability: what is stated in Scripture must find fulfillment—if not at the first promised time, in some subsequent manifestation. (4) Israel's failure to enter rest was not due to any divine falling short. The rest was available from the beginning of the world (v. 3), as shown by God's own resting on the seventh day from all His works (v. 4). (5) Any failure, therefore, is the fault of humanity, not God. The wandering tribes in the desert fell short because, although the gospel was proclaimed to them, they lacked faith and fell into disobedience (vv. 2, 6, 11). (6) The Christians addressed in Hebrews should have learned from Israel's failure. They too had received the good news, but unlike Israel it was necessary that they respond to the divine call of the Spirit's "today" and by faith enter into the rest that God provides (vv. 3, 6, 9–11). (7) The concept of rest undergoes a transposition of meaning. In 3:7–19, it signified rest from enemies in the land of Canaan, but vv. 4–11 deny, on the basis of Psalm 45:7–11, that the rest has yet been realized. So the apostle holds out a particular spiritual experience toward which Christians must persevere.

Behind these logical steps, we see the word of God. If God has said it, it will come to pass. Because God has promised rest, some of His people will attain the goal. Spanning the centuries, it is as real and vital now as when it first called men and women to God's goal.

The question of the time element in the "rest" spoken of in 4:1–11 is curious. On one hand, the apostle in several statements speaks of it as something that may be attained now. Those who have believed are entering that rest (v. 3), and the one who has entered His rest has rested (or ceased) from works as God did from His (v. 10). The emphasis on "today" (vv. 6–8) reinforces the idea of an entering into rest in the present.

Other statements, however, point to the future. The exhortation of 4:9–11 grows out of Israel's desert wanderings and clearly has a future tilt; for the wandering tribes, "rest" was a promise (Canaan) that was never fulfilled. Further, the promise of entering "rest" still remains (v. 6); it is something yet to be attained or lost. The "rest" itself remains (v. 9), and Christians are to fear falling short of it (v. 1). They are to be diligent, making every effort to enter that rest (v. 11). All these statements point to an unrealized goal of rest. The "rest" of 4:1–11 thus contains both present and future elements. God's people may now enter His promised experience of rest, but rest in its fullness will be experienced only at the Second Coming of Jesus.

As we find throughout the NT, in Hebrews the work of Jesus includes both benefits already realized and those still to come. The grand opening of the book (1:1–4) portrays the person of Christ Himself as the climactic Speech of God, who has provided purification of sins, and is sitting at the right hand of the Majesty in heaven waiting for the full assumption of lordship over the universe. The argument for the better sacrificial system in 9:1—10:18 will stress what the blood of Christ has already accomplished, but the writer strongly points to the Second Coming as the ultimate hope (10:35–39). Thus, the "rest" of 4:1–11 is the bliss of salvation into which we enter by faith in Him. It is a joy that is already a reality for Christians, but one that will attain an even deeper dimension in our eternal home with God.

The "works" mentioned in v. 10 do not refer to any system of works-righteousness as opposed to righteousness by faith. Nor are the works from which we cease to be equated with God's creative deeds. Rather, the point of the analogy is in the idea of cessation. The total line of argument that commences at 3:7 shows that humans cease their labors as they enter God's rest: rest that comes by faith. That is, works (labors) are the antithesis of the way of faith; they are the result of a rebellious, wicked heart of unbelief that has been hardened through sin's deceptiveness (3:16), a heart of disobedience (3:18; 4:6, 11) and unfaithfulness.

In the final two verses of the exhortation, the apostle returns to the note of warning (4:12–13)—He describes the all-seeing eye of God: everything is uncovered and openly visible to the eyes of Him to whom we must give an account. Those eyes are able to pierce to our innermost secrets and intentions. The verb trachēlizō used in v. 13 (sometimes translated as "open" or "exposed") means "laid bare." It is a term from wrestling, portraying a person pinned to the floor—utterly immobile and powerless. Thus, the apostle reaches back to the admonition that began at 3:7, reminding his readers that God can detect the unbelieving, evil heart and the hardening through sin's deceptiveness (3:12–13). So, we notice a change in subject in 4:12–13. We begin with the word of God that comforts us and searches our motives, as in Psalm 95:7–11. But then the encounter becomes one with God Himself, to whom we must give account. It is God who speaks to us personally; we should indeed be careful and fear the possibility of falling short (4:1).

4:14—5:10

Christ, the Merciful High Priest

In this section, the apostle develops and expands the theme of Jesus as High Priest first mentioned in 2:17. Christ's faithfulness as High Priest was elaborated in 3:1–6; now the emphasis falls on the merciful aspects of His ministry. The section has two distinct parts: 4:14–16, where the apostle gives an overall statement about Jesus as our great High Priest and what He means to us, and 5:1–10, where he compares Jesus and Aaron, who was a high priest under the Levitical system.

4:14–16. Our Great High Priest. Once again, we find in the Greek the construction dio, oun, dia touto ("therefore" or "so"; although sometimes not translated in English) followed by a collective admonition (see 2:1, 3:7; 4:1). Christianity is based on objective reality: we have a great High Priest. This reality transcends our subjective experiences and is independent of them. It is rooted and grounded in a Person external to us but preciously near to us. That is why, despite passing states of feeling or waves of hard times, we are to hold firmly to our confession of faith. We are to confess who He is and what He has done. This man—and only this man—has led us to God.

This is the third time that the apostle mentions Jesus as High Priest (4:14; cf. 2:17; 3:1). Apparently, the idea was already familiar to the Hebrews; he did not need to explain it. Throughout the book, he could assume his meaning was understood. His concern, instead, was to show the superiority of Christ's High Priesthood. Nowhere else in the NT is Jesus specifically called High Priest; however, we find various allusions to the idea (e.g., John 17:1–28; Rom. 8:34; 1 John 2:1; Rev. 1:13; 5:8–10).

Hebrews 4:15 elaborates on Jesus's ability to sympathize with our weaknesses. The basis of His sympathy lies not in His divine capacities as Son but in His humanity: He was tempted in every respect as we are. His own suffering in the tests of life on earth qualified Him to give help to those in the heat of the test (2:18). The apostle stresses the reality of the temptations of Jesus. The reality of the sympathy He feels and the help that He offers (4:16) are as genuine as the reality of His own tests during the phase of inferiority to angels. Christ was in all aspects tempted as we are. The basic issue in temptation is the same today as it was two thousand years ago: will we keep trusting God and seeking to follow His plan for us? It does not matter that Jesus was not exposed to all the areas of temptation that we face or that He encountered some that we will never experience. He was truly human and shared our human experiences—one with us in suffering and temptation.

In all Jesus's tests He emerged blameless: He was without sin (v. 15). There was no deviation from the divine will. This interpretation is preferable to the one that would link His being without sin to the phrase that immediately precedes it: His being tempted as we are, that is, sin excluded. Reading v. 15 as an attempt to safeguard the sinless nature of Jesus distorts the thrust of the passage and introduces an issue that is foreign to the apostle's thought (he underscores the sinlessness of Jesus in 7:26–27).

Because we have such a High Priest, we may approach God's throne of grace with confidence and boldness (4:16). The word here translated as "boldness" or "confidence" comes from the Greek parrēsia, denoting assurances or confidences. It occurs several times in Hebrews (3:6; 4:16; 10:19, 35). The term denoting the invitation to "approach" or "come" to God's throne is the Greek word proserchomai, which indicates that the doors of heaven's temple swing wide to welcome us. The help that our High Priest offers is primarily overcoming help. No doubt the author would not exclude the idea of forgiving help (the mention of "mercy" allows for it), but this is not his logical conclusion in the passage. Rather, his argument has set forth the portrait of a High Priest who, having victoriously undergone the fires of human test, now understands our struggles in the same sort of tests and stands ready to supply help.

Hebrews 4 and the Sabbath

1. "Rest" Terminology. In 4:4, the apostle refers to God's rest on the first Sabbath (Gen. 2:2) and picks up the idea in v. 9—a "rest" or "Sabbath rest" (sabbatismos) remains for the people of God. All through 3:7—4:11, apart from this verse, the author uses a single word for "rest": katapausis, which signifies rest or ceasing. At 4:5, we meet a word found nowhere else in the NT or the literature of the first century: sabbatismos. It connotes "Sabbath rest," "Sabbath-like rest," and "Sabbath-ish rest." The author very likely coined this word. He clearly meant it to be equivalent to katapausis, since he returns to that term in 4:10, but wishes to link the rest of what he says to the earlier reference to Genesis 2:2.

2. Rest and the Sabbath. His readers no doubt quickly saw the link. The rabbis taught that the Sabbath was more than a ceasing from labor; it was a foretaste of the age of the Messiah. Similarly, the rest Christians enter into now looks forward to full realization in the presence of God when Jesus returns. For the author of Hebrews, the Sabbath had a strong, positive connotation. Our rest in Christ, he argued, is like the Sabbath; it has the quality of the Sabbath. Obviously, both he and his audience were keeping the Sabbath. They had no thought about any other day; they were not debating the merits of Sabbath versus Sunday. Only in such a context could he call rest in Christ a sabbatismos.

5:1–10. Christ and Aaron. The comparison of Christ and Aaron proceeds in two parts. We first find a brief account of the characteristics of high priests in the OT (vv. 1–4), then a description of Jesus as High Priest (vv. 5–10).

Seven features of the Aaronic high priests are specified: (1) appointed by God to the office (vv. 1, 4); (2) coming from among the people, that is, having a representative function (v. 1); (3) acting on behalf of the people, playing a mediatorial role (v. 1); (4) serving a function in the system of worship, offering both gifts and sacrifices (v. 1); (5) offering sacrifices for sins (v. 1), that is, fulfilling an atoning function; (6) able to be gently compassionate toward sinners, since they are also subject to weakness (v. 2); and (7) needing to offer sacrifices for their own sins as well as for those of the people (v. 3).

The apostle here presents the divine plan for the priesthood. Unfortunately, far too many priests fell far short of it. They not only failed to be gentle and compassionate with the ignorant and wayward but, like Eli's sons, they flaunted their immoral conduct and were greedy for the spoils of their office (1 Sam. 2:12–17); or, like Pashhur, who opposed Jeremiah and put him in the stocks (Jer. 20:1–6), they opposed the work of God. The apostle does not embark on a point-by-point comparison of Jesus and Aaron. Instead, he selects just two of the features and applies them to Jesus: divine appointment to office and showing mercy.

The apostle underscored the divine appointment of Aaron (Heb. 5:4) and immediately applied it to Christ (v. 5). He found evidence for the latter in Psalm 110:4, which predicts the rise of a priest according to the order of Melchizedek (Heb. 5:6). The characteristic of a merciful high priest—first specified in v. 2—receives elaboration in a vivid passage about Christ's sufferings and temptations (vv. 7–10). This very strong language—entreaties and petitions, with vehement crying and tears (v. 7)—echoes the Gospel accounts of the struggles of Jesus in Gethsemane (Matt. 26:36–46; Mark 14:32–42; Luke 22:39–46). Our Lord looked full into the ugly visage of death and shrank from it. Even though He was a Son, He was not spared the grim reality of the test or given superhuman resources to avoid it. But He learned obedience (Heb. 5:8); He learned new levels of submission to the divine will and was thus perfected (v. 9). Through suffering, He qualified to become the cause and source of eternal salvation (v. 9). Just as the Aaronic high priest was to be able to be gentle and compassionate toward the ignorant and misguided, so the Son, by His own tests, experienced the realities of human experiences so He might be a sympathetic High Priest.

The logic of vv. 5–6 calls for closer consideration. We expect the apostle to immediately connect the announcement of the divine appointment to the priesthood in v. 5 with the citation of Psalm 110:4—a description of the eternal priest according to the order of Melchizedek. Instead, he first quotes Psalm 2:7 with its description of the King as the Son of God. The declaration of Sonship is attached to the divine appointment as the primary plank in the reasoning. The second statement, from Psalm 110:4, although important, is secondary, as shown by its introduction as something he says in "another place" (Heb. 5:6). Thus, it is because Christ is Son that He may be designated as High Priest after becoming human and being made perfect through sufferings (2:10).

The priesthood of Jesus emerges in new light. While Aaron shares features in common with Christ—in particular divine appointment and humanity—there is an immense difference between them. Aaron and all subsequent high priests were but faint representations or illustrations of the greater High Priest who would, at length, appear. Christ alone is the true High Priest, for only He combines, in His person, Sonship and humanity. Because Christ is Son, He has access to the very presence of God. Because He became human, He connects irrevocably to us. He is sympathetic, merciful, and helpful in our struggles. The final word of chapter 7 ("forever") sums up the point. The law appointed high priests who had weaknesses, but the promise coming after the law appointed the Son, who is perfected forever (7:28).

Looking back over 5:1–10, we see that the apostle is not only comparing Christ and Aaron, he is contrasting them. Of the seven features of the Aaronic high priest that he lists, the first two—divine appointment and mercy—find parallels with Christ. Two other features show considerable difference: Christ is not just another man; He is the Son, who became a man. And, unlike the Aaronic high priest, He has no need to offer sacrifices for His own sins, being sinless. The remaining three features—representative, worship system, and atoning functions—form the backdrop for the discussion of Christ as our great High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary (8:1—10:18).

5:11—6:8

Rebuke and Encouragement

In this exhortation, the apostle addresses the lack of spiritual maturity in his audience (5:11–14), explains the need to move on to spiritual perfection (6:1–3), and gives his audience a serious warning (6:4–8). He was concerned with the spiritual well-being of believers.

5:11–14. Spiritual Immaturity. The author abruptly breaks off the discussion of Jesus as High Priest. He had difficult material in hand—apparently the Melchizedekian priesthood, since this was the point where he terminated the argument and where he resumes the discussion in 6:20—and it is difficult to explain it clearly to his readers because they have become indolently inattentive (5:11). They were not ready for it; they had not grown spiritually. By this time, they ought to have been teachers, but instead they needed someone to again teach them the elementary principles of the word of God. They needed milk and not solid food (v. 12). They were still babies when they should have been of mature age—experienced in the ability to distinguish between good and evil (v. 14).

The term in v. 11 describing his indolently inattentive readers (nōthros) means "blunt," "dull," "sluggish," "remiss," or "slack." We see a development beyond the previous homiletic applications. Whereas 2:1–4 and 3:1–7 highlight the danger of these early Christians drifting away from the faith or of their hearts becoming hardened by the deceitfulness of sin, here the apostle is concerned with what has already happened to them.

6:1–3. Going on to Perfection. Having just castigated his readers for being immature and needing milk rather than solid food, the apostle announces his intention to give them solid food. And indeed he does by providing the reasoning for the priesthood of Christ after the order of Melchizedek (6:19—7:25). The apostle was not, as some commentators have suggested, dividing his audience at this point—offering the solid food to those who were ready to receive it. He apparently held that, given the spiritual state of the Hebrews—failing to grow and in danger of neglecting the great salvation they had been given and turning back to the world—only intellectual stimulation would meet their needs. They could be rejuvenated only by a deep consideration of the person of Jesus and what He had done for them.

6:4–8. A Severe Warning. This passage has disturbed Christians from the earliest centuries of the faith. Its apparent denial of repentance for sins committed after baptism led to the practice of putting off baptism until one's deathbed. It led to subsequent modification, as in the second century writing The Shepherd of Hermas, where one—but only one—post-baptismal lapse was permitted. Another second-century writer, Tertullian, applied his warnings only to sexual offenses. Commentators have tried to explain the passage in various ways. Some have suggested that "impossible" (v. 4) really means "difficult"—an unsatisfactory bending of the meaning of the word.

The passage can best be understood by observing it in relation to its parallels elsewhere in the book. The apostle repeats its ideas in a different form in 10:26–31 and 12:15–17. Both of these passages contain the same severe strictures against overt rejection of Christ. To grasp the meaning of 6:4–6, we should consider all three passages together. In all three, we discern privilege, offense, result, prospect of judgment, and reasons for the divine rejection.

Privileges

- 6:4–6: Enlightened, tasted the heavenly gift, sharers in the gift of the Holy Spirit, tasted the word of God, powers of the age to come
- 10:26–31: Knowledge of the truth, blood of the covenant, the Spirit of grace
- 12:15–17: The birthright/inheritance rights

Offense

- 6:4–6: Fall away
- 10:26–31: Sin willfully, trample Son of God underfoot
- 12:15–17: Profane, godless, selling of the birthright/inheritance rights

Result

- 6:4–6: Impossible to restore the repentance
- 10:26–31: No longer a sacrifice for sins
- 12:15–17: No place for repentance and regaining the blessing

Prospect of divine judgment

- 6:4–8: Rejected, cursed, burned
- 10:26–31: Fearful expectation of judgment, worse punishment than for the violator of Moses's law, falling into the hands of the living God
- 12:15–17: Falling from God's grace, being rejected

Reasons for divine rejection

- 6:4–6: Since they crucify again for themselves the Son of God and put Him to an open shame and public disgrace
- 10:26–31: Someone has trampled the Son of God underfoot, treated the blood of the covenant as something common and unholy, and insulted the Spirit of grace
- 12:15–17: Profane, godless

The emphasis shifts with each passage. Whereas 6:4–6 underscores spiritual privilege, 10:26–31 accents judgment, while 12:15–17 focuses on the impossibility of rehabilitation. The author is not attempting to produce a theology of repentance or a treatise on the unpardonable sin. Each passage occurs in a homiletic context, not a theological exposition. And in 6:9, the apostle immediately excludes his readers from the strong words he has just pronounced, being confident of better things in their case. In these three passages, he was holding out a practical possibility, warning them of what might happen if they took the values of the Christian religion lightly.

In each passage, the nature of the offense is especially significant. It points to an open, defiant rejection of Christ—to wanton, public disregard for His sacrifice. It is not a matter of a lapse or fall; it is the repudiation of Christ by a man or woman who once had known the joy of forgiveness and the newness of life in the Spirit. Such people take the place of the crucifiers of Jesus, making light of the cross, that in which they once found hope. They profane the holy, despising the salvation they had known. If Christ is rejected, there is no other way of salvation!

The book of Hebrews, which contains words of the most confident assurance in the NT, also includes the most severe statements. Both flow from a single idea. Because Christ is so precious, we may have absolute confidence in Him; but to reject Him is heinous. Spurning His blood that puts away our sin renders our case hopeless. What is needed is a life of faithful continuance in the Christian way. If these privileges are abused, we are like earth that produces thorns and briers (v. 8). Then, like it, we deserve divine judgment (burning; v. 8). This illustration ties together the strong rebuke of 5:11–14 with the severe warning of 6:4–6.

An Encouraging Word

Throughout the remainder of this third exhortation, the emphasis is upbeat—the apostle first praises the readers' good works (vv. 9–12), then encourages them with the certainty of God's promises (vv. 13–20).

6:9–12. Perseverance. We do not know if some Christians had already rejected Christ in the manner of 6:4–6. Perhaps that was still only a theoretical possibility; certainly, those for whom he prepared the document were far short of that denial. They were involved in better things (v. 9), and God took note of their labor for Him and for fellow Christians as it had been manifested in the past and was still displayed. The apostle's concern, however, was that they persevere in this way to the end.

Verses 11–12 encapsulate the purpose of Hebrews: that the hearers were to display earnest diligence until the very end to enable their complete assurance of the realization of their hope. The writer thus encouraged them, as in 5:11, not to be nōthros ("indolently inattentive") but rather to imitate inheritors of the promises through faith and patience. The practical goal in the writing of Hebrews is summed up in the concepts we find here: diligence, assurance, hope, the dangers of inattentiveness, faith, patience, and promise.

6:13–18. Abraham. The author next sought to set out the absolute certainty of God's promise. He cited Abraham as an example that illustrates both the nature of the divine promise and the appropriate human response to it. When God made a promise to Abraham (v. 13) of both descendants and land (Gen. 22:16–17), He made the promise doubly sure. First, it was His promise, and God's word is sure. Second, He guaranteed it by confirming it with an oath

(Heb. 6:17), just as humans interject oaths for confirmation (v. 16). We Christians are also heirs of the promise (v. 17), and likewise we are greatly encouraged because of this hope before us (v. 18). We too have both divine promise and divine oath—the two immutable things about which it is impossible for God to lie (v. 18). In our case, the oath is the prediction found in Psalm 110:4—that the Messiah would be an everlasting priest in the order of Melchizedek. The apostle referred to this oath specifically later, again coupling it with hope (7:19–22). On his part, Abraham patiently endured and eventually received the promise (6:15). So also must the Christians to whom the apostle wrote persevere in the faith.

6:19–20. Christian Hope. The long exhortation that began at 5:11 with a sharp rebuke closes with a ringing affirmation of the nature of the Christian's hope. Our hope is not a blind optimism, a buoyancy of spirit, or a conviction that, at last, everything will get better. Nor is it vulnerable to the vagaries of changing emotions. Christian hope is based on realities outside the believer. It rests on the fact that Jesus is our great High Priest (v. 20) who has entered into God's presence—which was, in the ancient sanctuary, manifested behind the curtain (v. 19). Unlike Aaron and the high priests of the old order, He continues forever following the order of Melchizedek (v. 20). That He has gone before us as the forerunner guarantees that, at length, we too will attain to the actual (realized) presence of God. Those facts make Christian hope an anchor of the soul (v. 19).

So far, the discussion of Jesus as High Priest has centered on the special features relating to His Person: His Sonship and His human experiences. But the prophecy of Psalm 110:4 goes further. With the designation of Christ as priest according to the order of Melchizedek, it points as well to a superior line of priesthood. Chapter 7 will take up this new dimension.

Behind the Veil

The phrase "behind the curtain/veil" (in some translations "within the veil") in Hebrews 6:19 is of particular interest to Seventh-day Adventists. In the past, it has been a point of theological controversy. Interpreters like Albion Foss Ballenger, a former minister, argued that the term in the Septuagint always refers to the Most Holy Place in the Israelite sanctuary. Therefore, he contended, the Book of Hebrews places Christ in the Most Holy Place in heaven, thereby contradicting Adventists' theology of Christ going into the Most Holy Place in 1844. But Ballenger failed to recognize that there were actually two occasions when the Most Holy Place was entered. One of those occasions was on the Day of Atonement; the other was when Moses placed the ark of the covenant in the Most Holy Place and dedicated it with oil before anointing Aaron as high priest (Ex. 40:1–9; Lev. 8:10–12; Num. 7:1). Which of these two events did the author of Hebrews have in mind?

While nothing in the immediate context refers to the Day of Atonement, there is evidence of the thought of an inauguration event. We are told in Hebrews 5:5–6 that Christ did not seek to glorify Himself in becoming High Priest, but God the Father said that He would be "a priest forever" following the order of Melchizedek. This is inauguration language. The inauguration of the earthly sanctuary and the appointment of Aaron as high priest are analogous to God's appointment of Christ as High Priest. As Christ assumed His role as our High Priest, he passed through the veil consecrating the heavenly sanctuary with His own blood and provided access to God. While the inauguration of the heavenly sanctuary is not described specifically in Hebrews 6:19–20, it is elaborated on in Hebrews 9:11–14, 23–24, and in 10:19–20.

Working through 8:1—10:25, we see that the entire argument ushers in two great ideas that show the magnificence of Jesus's offering of Himself: finality of sacrifice—because He died once for all—and access to the entire heavenly sanctuary, not just the Most Holy Place, because He has broken all barriers separating us from God. It is in this larger context that "behind the veil/curtain" is to be understood and not as a reference to Christ entering a specific apartment of the heavenly temple, particularly when one realizes that the meaning of the phrase is quite ambiguous or at least debatable.

The Better Priesthood

After the long exhortation, the apostle picks up the discussion where he left off at 5:10: Jesus was proclaimed by God as a High Priest in the order of Melchizedek. As in 4:14—5:10, where he expounded the role of Jesus as High Priest, he now elaborates His better priesthood—one after the order of Melchizedek.

7:1–3. Melchizedek. Apart from the book of Hebrews, Melchizedek is mentioned only twice in the Bible: first, in Genesis 14:17–20, which records his encounter with Abraham, and second, in Psalm 110:4, which announces the rise of a priest after the order of Melchizedek. In Hebrews 7, it is the second passage that becomes the center of interest. The apostle played on the various facets of the text as he demonstrated that Christ, although not qualified by birth to be a priest of the Levitical line, nevertheless is priest—one of a different, and superior, order (vv. 11, 15–17, 20, 21, 24, 28).

Melchizedek, king of Salem, priest of the Most High God (7:1), fascinated the rabbis. Considerable speculation endeavored to account for this seemingly mysterious character who, although not one of the chosen people, nevertheless was a genuine priest. He suddenly appears in the story of Abraham, without father, mother, genealogy, beginning of days, or end of life (v. 3). In these verses, which have puzzled many Christians, the apostle was simply following a recognized hermeneutic of his time, one in which he reasons out of the silence of the biblical record as well as its data.

There is nothing in Genesis to suggest that Melchizedek was anything other than another human being. But we do not find there any record of his parentage, birth, or death. He comes abruptly into the scene—combining in his own person the office of king and priest—and then disappears forever. The author of Hebrews builds on this omission of data to emphasize the perpetuity of the Melchizedek priesthood. In summarizing the story of Abraham and Melchizedek, the apostle was also selective. He did not mention the bread and wine that the priest-king gave to Abraham, which echoes the elements of the Lord's Supper. Likewise, he did not develop the royal aspect of Melchizedek; his interest ran a different course. He was content merely to show that Melchizedek was both king and

Psalm 110:4 in Hebrews

Psalm 110:4 permeates the book of Hebrews. The author continually quotes it in full or in part, or alludes to it as the theological source for the High-Priestly ministry of Jesus.

- In Hebrews 5:6, the words of appointment are quoted in full to show that Christ is divinely designated as High Priest, as Aaron was. Hebrews 5:10 summarizes 5:6.
- In 6:20, only the final part is quoted about becoming the High Priest forever following the "order of Melchizedek." By this, the author picks up the thread dropped at 5:10 and also introduces the entire discussion of chapter 7.
- In 7:11, he alludes to Psalm 110:4—reasoning for the necessity of a new order of priesthood.
- In 7:15, 17, the words of institution are again quoted in full. Here, he contrasts the new order with the old one—which required physical descendancy from Levi.
- In 7:20–21, the stress falls on the first part of Psalm 110:4 with its divine oath: "The LORD has sworn" and will not relent or change His mind.
- In 7:24, there is an allusion emphasizing the continuing High Priesthood of Christ in an unchangeable, permanent priesthood.
- In 7:28, there is a final allusion to Psalm 110:4, in which the motifs of High Priest, oath, divine appointment, and eternal office come together.

We may set out the changing emphases in the allusions to Psalm 110:4 by underscoring the key words for each of the above instances: Christ is priest forever (5:6), the order of Melchizedek (6:20), the order of Melchizedek (7:11), the order of Melchizedek (7:15–17), the Lord has sworn (7:20–21), forever (7:24), forever (7:28).

priest, as is the Son, while for both the spotlight falls on the sacerdotal office.

Melchizedek is not the center of attention in Hebrews 7. He enters into the discussion only in the first ten verses; subsequent references are to the order of Melchizedek, not to him personally. Even in the opening ten verses he is not the real focus of argument—Jesus is. The three verses that provide the mysterious cameo portrait issue in the conclusion of Melchizedek as made like and resembling the Son of God (v. 3). The epistle presents Melchizedek as like Jesus, not vice versa.

7:4–10. Melchizedek and Levi. The seven verses of this section make a theological point, namely, that Christ's priesthood is superior to that of Aaron and his descendants. Two acts establish the superiority of Melchizedek over Abraham: the patriarch gave him a tenth of his spoils (v. 6), and Melchizedek blessed Abraham (v. 6). The greater blesses the lesser (v. 7). But the author's interest runs beyond Abraham. Although most of the section deals with the patriarch and Melchizedek, vv. 9–10 reveal his real emphasis of Melchizedek as greater not only than Abraham but also than Levi.

The author reaches this conclusion by reasoning that Levi, who received tithes, paid tithes through Abraham, as it were—indicated by the phrase hōs epos eipein ("so to speak," "in a sense," "one might even say"; v. 9). The logic sounds strange to our Western ears—nurtured for so long on the philosophy of the individual: the one person, alone, before God and humanity. The Bible provides a necessary corrective. It tells us that we are more than individuals—that we have, as the people of God, a corporate identity. We are part of one another. When anyone suffers, hurts, or dies, we too are diminished. When Jesus confronted Saul of Tarsus on the Damascus road, Saul had been harassing the followers of Jesus, not Jesus Himself; but Jesus and His followers are so bound together that to persecute Christians is to persecute their Lord (Acts 9:4–5). We find the clearest expressions of corporate identity in the key terms "in Adam" and "in Christ" (1 Cor. 15:22; cf. Rom. 5:12, 19). We are all in Adam: we are one people, one race—sinners with one doom. But Christ has made a new race of people who have eternal life in Him (see Rom. 5:19; 6:5; 1 Cor. 15:22). In any case, the apostle is not saying that Levi literally paid tithe through Abraham. His phrasing indicates his figurative speaking.

Verse 8 introduces another point of contrast between Melchizedek and Levi. Melchizedek is declared to be one who lives, that is, the record does not mention his death. So in that sense, he remains a priest (v. 3). The apostle will draw out the implications of this idea when later (7:23–25, 28) he lays out the superiority of Jesus's priestly order.

7:11–13. A Change in the Priesthood. The "if" of v. 11 introduces a contrary-to-fact condition, that is, the very prediction of a new priesthood shows that the Levitical one was imperfect. The apostle considers it impossible that God would have two concurrent orders of priesthood (seen again in 8:4). Further, his view of Scripture supports the inevitability of the fulfillment of Psalm 110:4 in a new priesthood. His treatment of the priesthood here is similar to his discussion of "rest" in 4:1–11.

The specific point he wishes to develop in this passage emerges in 7:12–16, namely, the possibility of Christ becoming a priest. Perhaps he sensed some reluctance on the part of his hearers to grant the point. If, as seems likely, they came out of a Jewish background, their attachment to the old priesthood would be considerable. That Jesus belonged to another tribe—from which no one had ever served at the altar (v. 13)—would have been a major hindrance to their acceptance of the author's arguments for Jesus's priestly role.

The answer to this implied difficulty was in a total change of the priesthood. When the priesthood changed, the law also had to be changed (v. 12). Because the old priesthood, in which genealogy is crucial, was to be superseded by a new one, Christ could now become a high priest. This is what the author meant by his reference to a change of the law (v. 12). Here, "law" refers to the regulations concerning the old order (that is, one had to be born of the tribe of Levi), not to the moral law of the Ten Commandments or to tithing.

The apostle denied that perfection was possible under the old order (v. 11). He referred to the previous regulation/commandment (concerning the old covenant system of worship and sacrifices) as being weak and unprofitable, then stated flat-footedly that the law (the old law of the priesthood) "made nothing perfect" (vv. 18–19). Already in 2:10 and 5:9, the apostle used the language of perfection with reference to the Son, who was perfected by a series of human experiences, that is, He became qualified to be our great High Priest. In Hebrews 7, we find the same terminology in a different context; now it is used with a negative slant to describe the inadequacies of the old system. The author would develop this idea at length later while taking up the discussion of Christ's sacrifice (9:1—10:18).

7:14–17. A Better Priesthood. The apostle built his argument about the priesthood of Christ on two interlocking facts—one of which is evidently clear (v. 14), and the other even clearer (v. 15). Both of these statements reach back to his assertion in the preceding section: that a change in the priesthood necessitates a change of the law (v. 19). He brings forward two facts to establish this assertion. The first is the fact that Christ "our Lord" came (lineage-wise) from the tribe of Judah, of which Moses had indicated nothing about a priesthood (v. 14). The second is the prediction in Psalm 110:4 of a priest who would arise not because of genealogy but on the basis of the power of an endless, indestructible life (Heb. 7:16–17).

7:18–19. The Superiority of the New Order. These verses sum up the arguments advanced thus far in the chapter and point ahead to what will be elaborated in chapters 9–10. The previous commandment (of the old system) was weak and unprofitable (v. 18); it made nothing perfect (v. 19). These words echo 6:19–20 and highlight the theme of access to the presence of God—an idea that will be underscored in the following chapters. To this point in Hebrews 7, then, we see three ways in which the new order surpasses the old: (1) Melchizedek was greater than Levi, so the Melchizedekian order is better than the Levitical (vv. 4–10); (2) the Melchizedekian order centers in the power of an endless, indestructible life (v. 16); and (3) the Levitical order, based on mortal human beings (v. 7) could not bring perfection (vv. 11, 19), but the new order, which is better, presumably can—and Hebrews 8–10 will show that it does.

7:20–22. Priest by Divine Oath. In vv. 20–28, the apostle gives more reasons why the priesthood of Jesus surpasses the Levitical priesthood. The first of these comes in vv. 20–21: Jesus was designated Priest by God's oath. The former priests were made so without an oath, but Christ became a priest based on God's oath, as the author shows by again quoting Psalm 110:4—"the Lord has sworn" that the Messiah is "a priest forever." The oath removes any uncertainty as to the facticity of His priestly office—and goes beyond. It suggests a divine involvement in the new order that the old one could not claim. Hebrews 7:22 introduces another key motif of Hebrews: covenant. As elsewhere in the book, the author here merely gives the reader a hint of what is to follow. He takes up the motif again later, explaining it at length (8:6–13; 9:15–22; 10:16–18).

7:23–25. A Continuing Priest. The apostle now contrasts the impermanence of the Levitical priests with the continuing ministry of Christ. There were many priests (v. 23)—their length of service restricted by their mortality. Christ, however, remains forever and thus has an unchangeable, permanent priesthood (v. 24). Because Jesus lives forever, He has a permanent priesthood. His service is continuous—unbroken by succession, secure against death. We now have one Priest. Commentators have expressed different viewpoints over the meaning of the Greek phrase sōzein eis to panteles (v. 25). Some have seen its meaning as signifying "to the full extent" and thus render it as "save to the uttermost" or "completely save." Others, however, have understood it to mean "for all time," and have rendered it "save forever" (or with a different nuance, "always able to save") rather than viewing it as meaning "to the full extent." Although the latter understanding enshrines a truth of Christianity—Christ's ability to lift up men or women no matter how hopeless their condition—the apostle's emphasis in this passage is primarily on the ongoing ministry of Jesus in heaven above. He is the same for us as He was for Paul, Peter, and John. His ministry goes on—never ceasing—in the heavenly courts. Therefore, the translation "for all time" is also valid, and possibly preferable.

In His High Priestly ministry, Christ makes intercession for His people. This work is suggested elsewhere in Scripture (e.g., John 17; Rom. 8:34; 1 John 2:1–2). His intercession does not imply any reluctance on the part of the Father to accept sinners; there is no divine question or tension concerning our standing with God. The Bible teaches that God through Christ was reconciling the world to Himself, not ascribing people's own sins to themselves (2 Cor. 5:19). God loved us before Jesus came and died, not because He came and died (John 3:16). Christ's heavenly work of intercession therefore involves a ministry that, based on His atoning sacrifice, is imbued with compassion and sympathy because of His own experiences when He lived and suffered on earth. His work of mediation indicates that all of heaven's blessings reach us through Him.

7:26–28. A Sinless High Priest. Our great High Priest provides the solution to the sin problem; He is not part of it. Under the old order, the high priests needed to offer sacrifices first for themselves, then for the people's sins (v. 27). They were part of the problem they were trying to deal with. But not Jesus! No such need of sacrifice for Him. He is the High Priest from outside the system—set apart from sinners because He is holy, innocent, pure, and undefiled—serving in a superior place higher than the heavens (v. 26). Such a High Priest was appropriate for our need (v. 26). Although, like us, He experienced suffering, temptation, and submission to the divine will, He was radically different from us in that He needed no sacrifice or forgiveness.

Verse 27 introduces a new motif: "once for all." It will become a key idea in 9:1—10:18, encapsulating the apostle's affirmations about the all-sufficiency of Christ's sacrifice. Finally, the new priesthood has the perfected Son as its High Priest (v. 28). This is the final and climactic point of the apostle's presentation of Christ's better priesthood. Even in its purest manifestation, the Levitical order could never approach this mark. The Son—who has been perfected forever—pulls together the exposition of 1:5—2:18 and 4:14—5:10, and the author's references in v. 28 to the weakness of human beings and the surety of God's oath summarize the argument he has just concluded. It is a powerful finale.

8:1—10:18

JESUS, THE ONCE-FOR-ALL SACRIFICE

We have now arrived at the summit of the theological development of Hebrews. The discussion moves from the person of Christ to His work. In a sustained passage of close reasoning and deep power, the apostle will unpack the meaning of the phrase we encountered at the beginning of the book regarding Christ purifying us from our sins (1:3).

The long passage 8:1—10:18 progresses through five stages. At first, the writer speaks of the better ministry of Christ in a summarizing way (8:1–6a). Then, Jeremiah's prophecy of the new covenant (as cited in 8:8–13) lays the groundwork for a description of the old sacrificial system that highlights its inadequacies (9:1–10). This is followed by an explanation of the ministry of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary with its "better" blood (9:11–22). The superiority of the new sacrifice, which deals decisively with the sin problem, closes out the argument (9:23—10:18).

The Better Ministry

The first stage in this long passage (8:1—10:18) makes a case for the better ministry of Christ. To do this, the earthly sanctuary is compared with the true heavenly sanctuary and the service of the earthly priests is compared with that of Jesus.

8:1–2. The Place of Ministry. In v. 1, the author indicates that we have reached the main point of his presentation. It is that we have a High Priest who sat down "at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty" in heaven. This central affirmation is echoed throughout the book (2:18; 4:14; 7:25; 10:19; 13:10). In several places, the apostle sets out the superiority of the heavenly sanctuary. He calls it the "true tabernacle" (tēs skēnēs tēs alēthinēs; "tent"; 8:2), of which the earthly sanctuary was but a "copy and shadow" (8:5). In 9:11, the heavenly is "the greater and more perfect tabernacle," which was not made by humans, that is, not of this creation. At 9:23–24, the author reverts to the language of "copies" and goes on to call the heavenly sanctuary "heaven itself."

In 8:2, the Greek term translated "sanctuary" is tōn hagiōn. This term—in its singular form as here, or as the plural ta hagia or hagia—occurs a total of ten times in the NT, all of them in Hebrews. Different Bible translations render the expression in different ways, which can be confusing to the student of Hebrews. We will give careful attention to this term as we follow the apostle's argumentation in the chapters just ahead. Here at 8:2, the translations "sanctuary" or perhaps (lit.) "holy places" seem to be correct, as shown by the context (see "Ta Hagia in Hebrews," p. 1841).

8:3–6a. The Earthly Sanctuary and the Heavenly Sanctuary. A shift in discussion from the person of Christ to His sacrifice is suggested by the reference to the appointed priests offering gifts and sacrifices (v. 3). Just as the earthly high priests had to offer sacrifices of animals, so it was necessary that Christ as High Priest have something to offer (v. 3). The writer perhaps gives us a clue to the date of his writing in stating that there are priests who offer the gifts required by the law (v. 4). This could indicate that the Jerusalem temple system was still operative—placing the book's writing before A.D. 70, when the temple was destroyed by the Romans.

The earthly sanctuary was a copy and shadow of the heavenly sanctuary (v. 5). Moses was given a pattern of the work he was to do and told to adhere to it strictly (v. 5; Ex. 25:40). That pattern was a blueprint for construction—it was not the heavenly reality. No human structure could duplicate the dwelling place of God; at best, it could only point to the perfect temple in heaven. Thus, in referring to the earthly sanctuary, the apostle compares and contrasts the earthly and the heavenly. While there are similarities, the heavenly is clearly superior. Thus, Christ our High Priest in heaven above has obtained a ministry that exceeds the old one (v. 6).

In the apostle's description of the heavenly sanctuary, his vocabulary shows close affinities with that of Philo, a Jewish writer influenced by Greek thought who lived in Alexandria, Egypt, from about 20 B.C. to A.D. 50. Philo, like Plato before him, set out a two-level cosmology, with things on earth as shadows or copies of heavenly archetypes. For him, the language of the heavenly sanctuary was a vehicle for allegorization; the heavenly sanctuary was the universe. Thus, some interpreters of Hebrews have understood the treatment of Christ's work in the heavenly sanctuary as setting out great truths, but not pointing to a specific ministry in an actual heavenly temple.

Careful consideration of the argument of 8:1—10:18, however, leads to a different understanding. While Hebrews does show similarities to Philo's ideas—a two-level cosmology where things on earth are a copy of eternal, heavenly archetypes—in Hebrews, time plays a crucial role. The heavenly realities do not stand against the earthly copies or shadows in eternal contradistinction—they are crossed by time. Events in time—events on earth—impact events in heaven in a manner that Philo, or Plato before him, would not have accepted. Christ is not eternally High Priest in a heavenly temple; He became High Priest after undergoing human suffering and death. Nor does He always have a heavenly sacrifice to offer; it is Calvary that marks His moment of sacrifice (see 9:1—10:18). In Hebrews, the vertical, special schema of Philo is crossed by a linear, temporal one: the law was a shadow of the coming things, not the actual true form or image of the heavenly things (10:1).

Ta Hagia in Hebrews

1. Diversity of Translations: Ta hagia, with its variants, occurs a total of ten times in the NT, all of them in Hebrews. It is neuter plural and means literally "the holy things" or "the holy places." Translations of this expression vary greatly, the differences being most pronounced in four places: In 9:8, some translate it as "Holiest of All," others as "Most Holy Place," some as "sanctuary," and others as "holy places." In 9:12, some have "Most Holy Place," others have "Holy Place," and others have "holy places." In 9:25, some have "Most Holy Place" others have "Holy Place," and others "holy places." In 10:19, some have "the Holiest," others have "Most Holy Place," others have "sanctuary," and others "holy places."

2. Usage in the Greek Version of the Old Testament: The Septuagint helps a little in solving the problem of how to understand ta hagia. The plural with the article is used 109 times with reference to the sanctuary to designate specifically the whole sanctuary (106 times) or the Holy Place (three times). If this statistical information is correct, ta hagia is never used in the Greek version of the OT to refer to the Most Holy Place of the sanctuary alone. This is important, in that one could argue that the author of Hebrews used ta hagia along the lines of the Septuagint. But before jumping to this conclusion, we need to consider additional evidence.

3. Usage in Extra-biblical Jewish Writings Written in Greek: Since the Septuagint came into existence some two hundred or more years before the book of Hebrews was written, it is also important to consider the usage of ta hagia in Jewish literature that stands in closer proximity to the milieu of Hebrews—writings such as the OT Pseudepigrapha (200 B.C.–A.D. 200) and the works of Philo and Josephus, both of whom were contemporaries or near contemporaries of the author of Hebrews. As was the case with the Septuagint, the examination of these writings also reveals ta hagia was never used to refer to the Most Holy Place alone. It always refers to the entire sanctuary. While this does not prove that the author of Hebrews used the term identically, it does suggest that the customary use of the word would have led any first-century author or reader to use or understand a reference to ta hagia as a reference to the sanctuary in general and not to the Most Holy Place alone. With this in mind, we turn to the use of ta hagia in Hebrews.

4. Usage in Hebrews: Where the apostle's reasoning in Hebrews clearly indicates he was referring to a particular apartment, we should feel free to designate ta hagia or its variants as "sanctuary," "Holy Place," or "Most Holy Place." Where the context leaves his meaning uncertain, however, we are wise to translate it according to its customary use as "sanctuary." In 8:2, the plural ta hagia contextually designates the sanctuary as a whole, while in 9:1 the singular to hagion is also used for the sanctuary. In 9:2, hagia (without the article) refers to the "Holy Place," while the special phrase hagia hagiōn (both nouns are plural without article) in 9:3 is a superlative meaning "Most Holy Place." In 9:8, ta hagia is a reference to the heavenly "sanctuary" in contrast to the earthly sanctuary. We suggest that ta hagia in 9:12 is also designating the heavenly "sanctuary" into which Christ entered after His ascension. The same applies to the use of the term in 9:24. In the case of 9:25 there is a possibility that ta hagia refers to "the Most Holy Place" because the context mentions the "high priest" and "every year" (see 10:1–4). But if we keep in mind that during the Day of Atonement the high priest entered the Most Holy Place by first ministering in the courtyard and the Holy Place, it would be better to translate ta hagia here also as "sanctuary." Ta hagia in 10:19 should also be translated as "sanctuary" based on 9:12 and 24 with their emphases on access to God through Christ. Finally, in 13:11, ta hagia could be translated "Most Holy Place," but this is also not required because the blood of the sin-offering was occasionally brought inside the sanctuary throughout the year and not only on the Day of Atonement. The translation "sanctuary" would be appropriate in this case.

It appears that the use of ta hagia in Hebrews is in harmony with its use in the Septuagint, the Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, and in the writings of Philo and Josephus. As such, it should consistently be translated as "sanctuary," recognizing that there are some contextually debatable cases.

In recent years, biblical scholarship has swung away from the Philonic interpretation of Hebrews. More and more, it is recognized that apocalyptic Judaism rather than Hellenism is the thought world of the author and that he believed in an actual heavenly sanctuary. The Dead Sea Scrolls strongly support this understanding; they indicate that the sectaries behind these writings taught a real sanctuary in heaven with angels ministering in it.

The Better Covenant

In the OT, no motif is more important than that of covenant (v. 6). Its basic meaning is "contract" or "agreement," but with features that set it apart from the contracts familiar to us in human relations. When Yahweh in loving condescension enters into a covenant, the parties involved are not equal. Yahweh is infinitely greater and dictates the terms. The human party can only accept or reject the agreement; when they do accept, the covenant embraces them with precious promises that are assured by the divine commitment. Even though there is really only one divine covenant, we find Yahweh making many covenants: with Noah after the Flood (Gen. 9:8–17), with Abraham (Gen. 15:13–21), with Israel at Sinai (Ex. 19:3–6), and so on. Then, later in the OT, we find the prediction of a "new covenant" (Jer. 31:31–34).

In the NT, the covenant motif continues to be important (see commentary on Matt. 26:26–30 and Gal. 4:21–31). In Hebrews, "covenant" takes a somewhat different turn. The apostle connects it with the priestly work, either that of the OT—the first covenant (9:1)—or the heavenly ministry of Christ—the new covenant (8:8, 13; 9:15–18; 10:16, 29; 12:24; 13:20). Note that the same word, the Greek diathēkē, can be translated as either "covenant" or "testament."

The quotation from Jeremiah 31:31–34 in Hebrews 8:5–12 is the longest citation in the NT. It contains several promises: the law of God put within the heart (v. 10), no need for teachers because God will teach each person directly, everyone knowing God personally (v. 11), and the forgiveness of sins (v. 12). Unlike the apostle's approach in chapter 3, where he applied the quotation from Psalm 95:7–11 point by point, or chapter 7, where the prediction of Psalm 110:4 was dissected in detail, in the long citation from Jeremiah he did not expound on the various ideas. Only one aspect engaged his interest. At the conclusion of his exposition on the sacrifice of Christ, he again cited Jeremiah 31, but only in part—finishing with the reference to God's promise that He will no longer remember their sins and lawlessness (Heb. 10:16–17). Then, he added that the forgiveness or remission of these sins results in a situation where there is no longer any need for an offering for sin (10:18). This is the chief point he wished to establish with the citation from Jeremiah: under the new covenant the age-old problem of sin is decisively dealt with.

The better promises of 8:6, then, are the divine promises that the believers' sins and lawlessness will no longer be remembered (v. 13). These promises stand in contrast to the faulty promises the people uttered at Mount Sinai when they declared that they would do anything that the Lord asked (Ex. 19:8). While their intentions were good, the people at Sinai failed to realize the inability of sinners to accomplish all that God requires (Deut. 5:28–29). In the same way, the priestly mediation of Aaron and his sons could not truly atone for sin. Because the sacrificial system of the first covenant could not accomplish this, it was inadequate. If it had been faultless, there would have been no need or occasion for a second covenant (Heb. 8:7). The very prediction of a new covenant exposed the flawed nature of the first covenant with its priestly system. Just as the prediction of the Melchizedekian priesthood indicated the demise of the old priestly system (7:11–19), so the prophecy of the new covenant rendered the first obsolete and soon to disappear (8:13).

Limitations of the Old System

Hebrews 9:1–10 falls into two distinct sections. The first five verses give a thumbnail description of the OT sanctuary (vv. 1–5), while the second five point out the inadequacies of the former services (vv. 6–10).

9:1–5. Description of the Earthly Sanctuary. In his sketch of the earthly sanctuary, the apostle bases his discussion on the sanctuary that Moses constructed according to the divine plan (8:5). Throughout the description he refers to the tabernacle (skēnē; "a tent"; 9:2, 3, 6–8), rather than to the temple that Solomon built and which, after the captivity of the Jews, was restored and enlarged by Herod the Great.

The account of the Mosaic sanctuary highlights the two main features of its tabernacle: hagia ("the Holy Place"; v. 2) and hagia hagiōn ("the Most Holy Place," "holy of holies," or "holiest of all"; v. 3). The author shows no interest in attaching spiritual meaning or application to the various items of furniture in each of the two apartments. He eliminates any such discussion by saying that he cannot discuss these things in detail at the present time (v. 5).

One item in this description initially appears not to conform to the OT account. The author places the golden altar of incense (or censer) in the Most Holy Place (v. 4) rather than in the Holy Place (Ex. 40:17–27). Instead of concluding that the author simply made a mistake, it is important to note that the golden altar was connected in function to the priestly ministry carried out in the Most Holy Place. It was on this altar that special incense was burned that symbolized the continual intercession that arose before the presence of God in the Most Holy Place (Ex. 30:7–10, 34–38). For this reason, when Moses was instructed to place the golden altar in the Holy Place of the Tabernacle, the location of the altar was not described in connection to the other furnishings within the Holy Place. Rather, the golden altar's location was in relation to the articles within the Most Holy Place (Ex. 30:6; 40:5), even though it was physically in the Holy Place. The connection between the golden altar and the Most Holy Place is also indicated in 1 Kings 6:22, where it says that the altar was (Heb.) laddebir, "the inner room," the Most Holy Place. The Hebrew preposition le used here can have a number of different nuances, including "belonging to," as some translations have rendered it in this passage. Thus, while the altar "belonged" to the Most Holy Place in terms of its function, it was placed in the Holy Place because the priests needed to be shielded from God's visible presence.

Hebrews appears to recognize this distinction between function and location. When describing the location of articles within the Holy Place in 9:2, the author says that the lampstand, the table, and its bread were en ("in") it. The terminology changes, however, in vv. 3–4, where it says that the Most Holy Place echousa (was "having" or "had") the altar, the ark, and their associated instruments. The Greek en hē in v. 2 clearly refers to location, while the change to echousa ("having") suggests the idea of function.

9:6–10. Limited Access. The apostle next comes to the point he wished to make in his description of the Mosaic sanctuary and its rituals. He lays bare the two inadequacies of the old sanctuary system: limited access and limited cleansing. The priests carried out their services in the Holy Place, the outer room, the first part of the tabernacle (v. 6). This was an ongoing ministry: they entered the first apartment dia pantos ("always," "continually," "regularly"; v. 6). But only the high priest once a year (v. 7) could enter the second inner room, the Most Holy Place (v. 7). Further, the continual ministry by priests and high priests—the very repetition of the services—pointed to their incompleteness. In themselves, they could not pronounce the final word against sin. The various gifts and sacrifices (v. 9) were merely external (lit. "of the body or flesh," "physical") ordinances that in God's purposes served for a limited time—until the time of reformation and the new order of things (v. 10).

As long as the first sanctuary (v. 8) had standing, the way into the heavenly "sanctuary" ("sanctuary" is the more accurate translation here; see "Ta Hagia in Hebrews," p. 1841) could not be opened. Just as the old priesthood gave way when the new appeared and the new covenant made the first obsolete, so the ministry of the heavenly sanctuary could come into play only as the old ceased to have standing.

As the discussion of Jesus's saving work develops in Hebrews 9:11—10:18, the two points of access and cleansing will feature prominently. The apostle will show that, in contrast to the situation in the old earthly sanctuary, Christ's ministry in the heavenly sanctuary—offering not the blood of animals but Himself—opens up access to the very presence of God to all—not just to the high priest once a year—and provides a complete answer to the problem of sin that negates the need for any further animal sacrifices.

Hebrews 9:6–10 introduces two new motifs that play important roles in the ensuing argument. The first is blood: the earthly high priest entered the Most Holy Place each year, not without blood (v. 7). The second is conscience (v. 9). The apostle's meaning of this apparently familiar term will become clear in the unfolding argument. Thus, the contrast between the old system and the new will come to expression in the terms of imperfection/perfection (v. 9), and conscience/physical regulations (vv. 9–10).

Defilement and Purification

This passage falls into two sections: the first (vv. 11–14) sets out the superiority of the blood of Christ over the sacrifices of animals; the second (vv. 15–22) shows the relation of blood to covenant. Each section contains statements that reveal the basic axioms on which the author's argument rests.

9:11–14. The Better Blood. Just as the apostle sets out the human dilemma in terms of defilement (see "Sanctuary Language in Hebrews," p. 1845), so he presents the cleansing agent par excellence: blood. But not just any blood, and certainly not animal blood, providing outward or ceremonial purification but unable to cleanse the conscience. No, he tells of better blood than all others: Christ's blood that opens the way into the heavenly sanctuary (this is the better translation of ta hagia in v. 12; see "Ta Hagia in Hebrews," p. 1841).

The description of Christ's entrance into the heavenly sanctuary in Hebrew 9:12 has often been understood to mean that He assumed a Most Holy Place ministry at His ascension. In addition to assuming that ta hagia is a reference to the Most Holy Place, those advocating this position have also interpreted the blood of goats (tragōn) and calves (moschōn) as a reference to the calves and goats sacrificed on the Day of Atonement. While the word for "calf" (moschos) does appear in the description of the Day of Atonement sacrifices in the Septuagint translation of Leviticus 16, the word for "goat" (tragos) does not; in fact, tragos is never used for the Day of Atonement sanctuary legislation in the Pentateuch. The term used instead in Leviticus 16 is chimaros. It is significant that the only place tragos occurs in relation to the OT ceremonial system in the Pentateuch is in Numbers 7, where it is connected to the inauguration rituals of the earthly sanctuary. Thus the event alluded to in Hebrews 9:12 is not the Day of Atonement but rather the rituals related to the inauguration of the sanctuary. The author makes this point explicit just a few verses later, when the blood of these same two animals is mentioned again in clear connection to the inauguration of the covenant (see "Behind the Veil," p. 1836).

As we have already seen, Hebrews 9:1–11 describes the transition from the (earthly) covenant and its sanctuary to the new covenant and its (heavenly) sanctuary. Building on that point, in v. 12 the author describes how Christ opened up the way into the heavenly sanctuary (cf. v. 8). This occurred at the ascension, when Christ began his High Priestly ministry by inaugurating the heavenly sanctuary, not with the blood of goats and calves—as was done when the earthly sanctuary was inaugurated—but with his own blood. Then, in vv. 13–14 and 10:4, the author expands the reference to demonstrate how Christ's sacrifice surpasses the whole system of sacrifices in the OT.

As we carefully examine the writer's logic in these chapters, we detect the axioms on which he has structured the argument. Three passages stand out: 9:13–14, 9:22, and 10:4. The following pattern emerges:

Basic Axiom—9:22. The necessity of blood for purification and removal of sins.

Sub-Axioms

- 9:9–13 and 10:4. Animal blood is able to provide an external level of purification, but it is impossible for it to provide decisive purification of sins.
- 9:14. The blood of Christ, however, brings such purgation of sins (cleanses the conscience).

Thus, 9:13–14 emerges as the pivotal passage in the closely reasoned argumentation of Hebrews. It shows that the author maintains a strict line of thought closely connected with

Sanctuary Language in Hebrews

Hebrews 9:11–22 plays on four important motifs: defilement, purification, blood, and covenant. The human problem is described here as defilement. Human beings are dirty—defiled. They cannot come before a Holy God because of the uncleanness that clings to them. They need to be washed—to be purified. This motif of Hebrews has been widely overlooked by commentators. Just as outward or ceremonial impurity barred the ancient Israelites from worshiping at the sanctuary, our impurity, which embraces the total being, keeps us from the heavenly reality.

Although we occasionally find terms other than purification to describe Christ's saving work, such as redemption (9:15), the primary description in Hebrews is that of cleansing or purgation. The apostle sets the pattern from the outset, in his opening statement of the book summarizing Christ's work (1:3). As he brings his theological development to a climax in 9:1—10:18, he again stresses the purification motif:

9:13	Animal blood brings ceremonial purification (outward cleansing or "purifying of the flesh") to those who are outwardly unclean.
9:14	Christ's blood, however, cleanses the "conscience"
9:22	Under the OT system, almost everything was purified with blood.
9:23	The earthly things, which were copies of the heavenly, were purified with animal sacrifices, but the heavenly things required something better.
10:1–2	If animal sacrifices could have purified or cleansed the worshipers, they would not have needed to be offered year after year.

In dealing with the language of defilement and purification in Hebrews, commentators have tended to unconsciously glide to more familiar terminology, such as guilt and justification. But, while defilement/purification points to the same reality as the other terminology, the models are not collapsible. We must allow the apostle to speak to us in the language that the Holy Spirit revealed to him.

The argumentation of Hebrews moves within the theological orbit of defilement and purification. In this respect, it is the counterpart of the other biblical book that centers on the ceremonial system: Leviticus. Just as Leviticus sets out detailed regulations concerning ceremonial defilement and the means of purification, with blood being the preeminent agent, so Hebrews provides its complement. Here we find, in the ministry of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary, the meaning of the old system as well as the reason for its being superseded.

the sacrificial system, with the idea of the better blood of Christ summing up his thesis. He does not suggest that the OT sacrifices were "primitive" or infantile; rather, he gives them a place but shows their ultimate inadequacy to deal with the problem of sin. It is not a matter of the old being bad and the new (Christ's blood) being good or of the old being material and the new, spiritual. Rather, we see the good and the better—both being bloody sacrifices within the orbit of defilement-purification.

The term "blood" (haima) is of great significance to the apostle. At times, he refers to "sacrifice" (9:26; 10:1–3, 5, 11, 12), and even "body" (10:5–10), but he returns to "blood" for his most emphatic affirmations (9:7, 12, 13–14, 18–21, 22–23; 10:4, 19, 28–29; 12:24). For him, "blood" carries its own argumentative force, and we should be wary of simply equating it with "death" or "sacrifice."

This term, "blood," seems reducible to no other. It signifies Christ's death—but more, His death applied to our problem of defilement. It points to Christ's life poured out for us—life that gives us life and brings cleansing and healing. Just as the language of defilement and purification strikes a deep response within our conscience, so the language of better blood speaks directly to our religious need in a manner that cannot be replaced by other terminology.

9:15–22. Blood and the Covenant. In vv. 15–20, the apostle picks up the covenant motif from chapter 8. This passage is one of the most difficult to interpret in the NT. Its difficulties arise from both the problems of comprehending its ideas and the possibility of translating the Greek (diathēkē) as either "covenant" or "testament" (will). Accordingly, three schemes of interpretation have been advanced: (1) diathēkē translated throughout as "will" or "testament," an option that has attracted little support since vv. 15 and 18–20 point irrevocably to covenant; (2) diathēkē translated throughout as "covenant," in which the principal objection arises in vv. 16–17 as it is argued that it simply is not true that the death of the covenanter must be established; and (3) diathēkē being used as a play on its double meaning, changing from "covenant" in v. 15 to "will" or "testament" in vv. 16–17 and reverting to "covenant" with v. 18. Most translations have chosen this option, usually giving the reader an indication of the dual possibilities involved in diathēkē.

This line of reasoning is flawed, however. It is too subtle and breaks the development of the covenant motif that began in chapter 8 and reaches its finale in 10:18. The apostle is talking about "covenant" throughout, not switching to "will" for two verses and immediately dropping back to "covenant." The linking of covenant and death is precisely his point. The death of Christ alone establishes the new covenant. Verse 15 made that assertion: Christ is the Mediator of the new covenant through His death.

Despite the obscurity surrounding the interpretation of vv. 16–17, the author's overall meaning in the passage is clear. He is arguing for the fulfillment of the promises of the new covenant, quoted in chapter 8 from Jeremiah 31:31–34. The new covenant is now in force, he asserts, because Christ's death has ratified it. Although Jeremiah 31:31–34 does not make mention of bloody sacrifices, the author ties the covenant to the sacrificial system. He calls the reader's remembrance to the story of Exodus 24:1–8, when the Sinai covenant was inaugurated by the sprinkling of blood (some manuscripts have "goats and calves," others just have "calves," as is reflected in the different translations; Heb. 9:19). In the same way, the blood of Christ brings about the new, wherein sins are decisively dealt with.

Although the covenant idea predominates the OT, the apostle here makes it subservient to the blood motif. The new covenant prediction of Jeremiah 31:31–34 is important because it promises purgation of sins; it is the blood of Christ, however, that brings that promise to reality. Thus, the prime axiom of Hebrews 9:22—that without the shedding of blood there is no remission or forgiveness of sin—stands over the lintel of the discussion, and the covenant is brought beneath it.

The expression "shedding of blood" (v. 22) comes from a single word in the Greek: haimatekchysia. This word occurs nowhere else in the NT, or in Greek literature of the period, so we are dependent on the context to indicate its meaning. As we trace the author's reasoning throughout 9:1—10:18, his emphasis does not fall on the slaying of animal sacrifices but rather on the application of their blood. Thus, in 9:7 the high priest offers blood on the Day of Atonement for himself and for the sins of the people. A similar argument is made in 9:11–14. In vv. 18–21, the first covenant was dedicated with blood when Moses sprinkled the blood of calves and goats on the book/scroll, people, tabernacle, and vessels of ministry. It therefore seems likely that the meaning of haimatekchysia—a word possibly coined by the apostle—is blood sprinkled or applied rather than blood shed.

The apostle did not explicitly attempt to explain how the blood applied takes away sin. In 9:22 we get a glimpse into a system—the mystery of how God takes care of the sin problem. His solution stipulates that Christ's blood alone is the agent of purification. In 9:22 the word translated as "remission" or "forgiveness" is the Greek aphesis, which means "removal" or "taking away." The author's use of purification language in parallel with aphesis in v. 22, and then again in v. 23, indicates that his meaning in v. 22 carries the idea of the eradication of sin—not only its remission or forgiveness. The language is related to the sacrificial system and the sanctuary and is to be understood in this setting.

9:23—10:18

Superiority of the New Sacrifice

In the author's description of the old system (9:1–10), he underscored its two limitations: restricted access to the presence of God and no finality in dealing with sin. The passage before us will argue for the superiority of the blood of Christ by showing how it accomplishes what the old system could not. The first section (9:23–28) will especially bring out the access ideas, while the remainder will contrast the repeated nature of the OT sacrifices with the single, efficacious self-offering of Christ (10:1–18).

9:23–28. Finality—Once for All. An arresting concept opens the discussion. The apostle asserts that it was necessary that the copies of the heavenly things (that is, the earthly sanctuary, which was a copy [8:5] of the heavenly temple) should be purified with these animal sacrifices, but the heavenly things themselves (that is, the heavenly sanctuary) with better sacrifices (that is, the blood of Christ) (v. 23). The idea of heavenly things being in need of cleansing boggles the minds of many commentators, especially those holding to a Philonic understanding of Hebrews. But if the author, like the Jews of that time, believed in an actual temple in heaven, his comments are readily comprehensible. Although he does not elaborate on the meaning in his cryptic comments, it seems clear that Christ's heavenly work entails a cosmic-scale benefit stemming from His sacrifice that was typified through the ritual of the Day of Atonement (see commentary on Dan. 8:9–14).

The theme of access dominates this section and continues into chapter 10. As the high priest entered the presence of God always with blood (9:7), so Christ entered heaven with His own blood as sacrifice. What is the exact comparison the author is making between the old system and the new, both here and in the subsequent section? The previous context suggests it is the cleansing associated with the inauguration of the temple and the ratification of the covenant with the people (vv. 12–22). Verse 25, however, reflects the backdrop of the Yom Kippur services, that is, the Day of Atonement. We know this by the mention of a high priest (as opposed to just a priest, who was restricted to the first apartment of the tabernacle) and "every year" (v. 25).

As noted previously, 9:25 has been translated in various ways: "Holy Place," "sanctuary," "Most Holy Place," or "holy places" (see "Ta Hagia in Hebrews," p. 1841). The apostle argued that the blood shed at Calvary opened full access to God; its breaking down of barriers between humanity and God was only hinted at in the access provided the OT high priest once a year on Yom Kippur. Not only did the blood of Christ open access to the presence of God in a manner that the old services could not, it also differed from the ancient sacrificial ceremonies of the Day of Atonement in that it was a single sacrifice by which the heavenly sanctuary itself was cleansed. The author hammers home this point by contrasting the repetitive nature of the sacrifices of the old system in vv. 25–26 with the singular occurrence of the sacrifice of Christ in vv. 26 and 28. Thus, in 9:23–26 we see the balance and contrast of ideas as the author stresses the superior nature and benefits of the blood of Christ:

Old Sanctuary System	New Sanctuary System
Purified	Purified
By blood	By blood
BUT
A copy of the reality	The true sanctuary
Blood of another	Sacrifice of Himself
Repeated sacrifices	Once for all
Earthly Most Holy Place	Presence of God

The apostle's teaching of unhindered access to the presence of God is an appealing one. There are no favorites here—no dividing of humankind on the basis of learned and ignorant, rich and poor, male and female, privileged and suppressed. The doors of the heavenly temple have been flung open; all are welcome. No need now to bring a gift, to seek to placate, or to hire a go-between. The "so great a salvation" (2:3) of Hebrews proclaims the end to all gifts, all devices, and all intermediaries. Because Christ is our great High Priest, we have access (by faith) to God in His heavenly temple.

The finality of Christ's sacrifice comes into sharp focus in a particular term: ephapax ("once for all") or hapax ("once"). We first find the idea in 7:27, where the apostle wrote that Christ offered Himself "once for all" (ephapax). In 9:11—10:18, however, it becomes a leading thought: in 9:12, Christ entered the heavenly sanctuary ephapax; in 9:26, He came hapax to take away sins; and in 10:10, we have been made holy by Christ's sacrifice ephapax.

In contrast to Christ's once-for-all sacrifice, the priest in the earthly sanctuary had to offer repeated sacrifices: in 9:6, the priests regularly served in the Holy Place; in 9:25, the earthly sanctuary required sacrifices every year; in 10:1, the same sacrifices were offered repeatedly, year by year; in 10:3, the same sacrifices were offered on the Day of Atonement every year; and in 10:11, the priest offered the same sacrifices repeatedly.

So, we see the third of the apostle's contrasts in 9:1—10:18: not only full access to the heavenly temple instead of limited access to its copy; not only thorough cleansing from sin instead of merely ceremonial purification; but also one sacrifice instead of many—one sacrifice never to be repeated; one sacrifice for all peoples; one sacrifice that brings all other sacrifices to an end.

The writer's eschatology comes to sharp expression in 9:26–28. Throughout its theological argumentation, Hebrews looks back. The "once for all" (ephapax) motif focuses its concentration on the Son becoming man and by His death offering the decisive sacrifice for sin. It is because of the certainty of what has already happened—in the person of the Son and His becoming our great High Priest—that the apostle can speak with such assurance and admonish his readers to hold fast their confession of the Son. With this strong note of realized eschatology, there is nevertheless also an emphasis on the future. It was first sounded in the initial four verses of the book—in the suggestion of a waiting time before the regnant Son takes up His total rule. Now, in 9:26–28, the idea reappears in undeveloped form: He will appear a second time, apart from sin, to save those eagerly waiting for Him. The parousia (Second Coming), however, will add nothing to His achievement already won on Calvary. That event was the end or culmination of the ages (v. 26).

The apostle's strong belief in the eschaton—the climax of human history when Jesus will come again—receives strong emphasis in the long exhortation that follows the theological argumentation of 8:1—10:18 and that rounds out the book (10:36–39; 11:39–40; 12:25–29).

10:1–4. Perfecting of the Conscience. In this passage we again meet the notions of being made perfect (v. 1) and the guilty conscience (v. 2). They recur in the context of the author's denigration of the OT sacrifices on the basis of their repetition. His basic argument is that the very fact of the repeated services every year (vv. 1, 3) shows their inability to eradicate Israel's sin. The sacrifices were only a shadow of what would follow—not the true form of the reality (v. 1) of Christ's death and its decisive dealing with sin.

In vv. 1–3, the following parallelism of ideas emerges:

v. 1	Make perfect those who draw near to God
v. 2	Worshipers purified or cleansed
v. 3	Worshipers have no more guilt or consciousness of sins
v. 3	No more reminder of sins every year

The word used for the feeling of guilt in v. 2 (syneidēsis) is the same one that has the connotation of "conscience" elsewhere in Hebrews (9:9, 14; 10:22; 13:18). Its meaning now becomes clear: it is not the moral arbiter of an individual—as the term is commonly understood—but the continual consciousness or remembering of sins. Nor are the apostle's remarks directed toward the individual, as ours are when we speak of conscience. Rather, the author is portraying Israel's national consciousness before Yahweh—a consciousness that is shown by the repeated need to observe Yom Kippur.

The point he wishes to make is this: the one sacrifice of Christ has removed all reminder of sin. All defilement has been purified, just as all barriers between humanity and God have been broken down. Now there is no need for annual ceremonies of fasting and sacrifice, for a decisive purification of sin has been made that will be consummated at the coming of the Lord.

While the OT sacrificial system could not perfectly clear the conscience or consciousness of the worshiper (9:9–10; 10:1–3), Christ's single offering has perfected them forever (10:14, 22). They have obtained purgation of the pervasive sense of unease before God. The two references to perfection in chapter 7 (vv. 11, 19) now become clear. No perfection was possible under the law of the old system, because its sacrifices were simply inadequate in themselves. The imperfection was intrinsic to the sacrifices: it was impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins (10:4). With 7:19, we see an extension of the meaning of perfection: by the new sacrificial system we draw near to God, that is, have access. Thus, the "perfection" of Christians in Hebrews is a term related to the sanctuary system, not an ethical one. It embodies the twin aspects that the knowledge of the sacrifice of Christ has brought: unhindered access to God with consciousness that the defilement of sin has been fully purified.

10:5–10. Christ's Death Fulfills God's Will. Once again, the apostle looks to the OT for a prediction of the sacrifice of Christ. He finds it in Psalm 40:6–8, which speaks of the divine turning away from animal sacrifice to the offering of the body of Christ. The author is dependent on the Septuagint for the key word "body" (vv. 5, 10) in the passage cited; the Masoretic Text has "open ear" instead. And, as in his presentation earlier (see 7:11, 18; 8:12), the very fact of prediction ensures the end of the old. As with priesthood and covenant, so with the sanctuary system—the first is taken away so that the second can be established (10:9).

We again see the hand of deity superintending all. It is the divine will that the old system be put aside. That same will sent forth the Son to our world, where He became qualified to be High Priest and to make atonement for sins. Ultimately, it is that will that has brought so great a salvation to Christians. The concept of being sanctified or made holy (v. 14) suggests the status of belonging to God, set apart for His worship.

10:11–18. The Old and the New Summarized. The final passage of the long theological exposition that began at 8:1 pulls together the leading motifs and summarizes—by terse comparison and contrast—the benefits of the better blood of Christ. Here we find the crucial differences between the old worship system and the new (10:11–12):

Old Sanctuary System	New Sanctuary System
Every priest (that is, many)	This one, this priest (one only)
Stands (unfinished work)	Sat down (completed)
Offering repeatedly (unfinished work)	Offered (completed)
Same sacrifices (many)	One sacrifice
Repeatedly, again and again	Forever, for all time
Daily	Offering complete
Religious services (limited access)	Right hand of God
Never take away sins	Perfected forever (v. 14)

The contrast is striking and radical: one instead of many, sitting instead of standing, one sacrifice instead of repeated sacrifices, one completed offering instead of ongoing offerings, the work completed forever instead of daily ministration, the very presence of God instead of limited access, and the thorough purgation of sins instead of sacrifices needing to be performed over and over.

Verse 14 hammers home the once-for-all totality of the sacrifice of Christ in dealing with the age-old problem of sin. It is one sacrificial offering that accomplished God's purpose and sealed the plan of salvation. That offering has perfected His people. That is, in the parlance of Hebrews, it has removed the pervasive consciousness—the guilt of sin. And it has removed it forever.

The apostle's understanding of sanctification is noteworthy. On one hand, he states in v. 10 that we have been sanctified or made holy (past tense), but on the other hand, he states in v. 14 that we are being sanctified or made holy (present tense). This coupling of ideas in close proximity helps us to understand that God's plan of sanctification of His people includes both a status of being set apart as holy and an ongoing process of becoming holy. The apostle adds a third dimension later in the book: he states that without holiness no one will see the Lord (12:14). Thus, although Christians are already perfected and have been set apart by a holy God for Himself, they are to grow in and pursue holiness.

In 10:16–18, the apostle returns to the long citation of Jeremiah 31:31–34 that he quoted in full in Hebrews 8:8–12. Now, however, he cites only the opening and closing portions of the passage. The point he wishes to underline is the closing part that predicts the end of sins. This is clear from his conclusion: when sins are completely forgiven, there is no more need for sacrifices (10:18). The passage from Jeremiah predicted a time when animal sacrifices would cease because thorough purgation of sin was to have come into being. Thus, these concluding words of the long exposition of 8:1—10:18 once again contrast the old sanctuary system (inadequate to deal with sin) with the new one, where Christ is our great High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary, ministering the benefits of His once-for-all, all-sufficient sacrifice of Himself.

The apostle's strong, repeated argumentation setting out the superiority of the new sanctuary system over the old indicates that his hearers had a strong attachment to the Jerusalem temple and its rituals. That they came from a Jewish background therefore seems highly likely. With 10:18, the theology of Hebrews reaches its climax and conclusion. From the great WHAT—how magnificent is Jesus and how magnificent His work—it has established the basis for the SO WHAT that follows—how we therefore should live. This exhortation and application will continue to the close of the book.

EAGERLY AWAITING CHRIST'S RETURN

The "therefore" (Gr. oun) of Hebrews 10:19 marks the transition from exposition to application. Since 7:1, the apostle has engaged his readers in a sustained argument designed to establish and elaborate on Christ as their High Priest and sacrifice. Now, he will devote the remainder of the book to indicating how this theological construct should affect their lives. He will first show that Christian existence on this earth is a pilgrimage in which believers travel to the better country (10:19—12:2) and to the better city (12:3—13:15). In this discussion, faith is a key characteristic to help lay hold on the invisible world (10:19—13:25). Throughout 10:19—13:25, the note of hope predominates. The "not yet" of the gospel—suggested in the author's reference to the Son being "appointed heir of all things" (1:2) and sounded again in the encouragement that Christ will appear a second time to save those who are eagerly waiting for Him (9:28)—now comes to full expression.

The Better Country

This section falls into five parts. The first three are short, taking up in turn the full assurance that the high-priestly theology brings (10:19–25), a strong warning against deliberate turning away from the new system in the blood of Christ (vv. 26–31), and an exhortation to faithfulness (vv. 32–39). Chapter 11 comprises the fourth part. Here we see the need of faith, as the apostle lists a long line of men and women of old who, sensing that they were but pilgrims on earth, lived in hope as they faithfully sought a better, heavenly country (11:16) that God had prepared for them. The final part (12:1–2) encouraged the Hebrews to contemplate Jesus while striving to be steadfast in their pilgrimage.

10:19–25. In Full Assurance. The first four verses summarize the accomplishment of Christ for which 7:1—10:18 argued and show its significance for Christian living. They are a succinct statement of the purpose of the book—theology and exhortation flowing together under the rubric of full assurance of faith (10:22). Again, we see the twin benefits of Christ's work. He has opened the way into the heavenly sanctuary, where He Himself is High Priest. There is now unimpeded access to the presence of God. Further, Christ has sprinkled our hearts clean from an evil, guilty conscience (v. 22). He has made full purification of sin. These two blessings of the salvation provided in Jesus express the openness of God toward humanity. They express the good news of the NT that seems impossible to grasp because it reverses human priorities and striving and tells us that, before we try to win acceptance with God, He already has taken us to Himself.

We notice the means by which these blessings have come—by the blood of Christ (v. 19). According to Hebrews, there is no mistake in the tragedy of the cross. While it was a gross miscarriage of justice, it was the divine instrument of salvation.

So the Christian's response: boldness, or confidence, to enter (v. 19) and draw near with an honest heart and with the full assurance that faith provides (v. 22). The word translated parrēsia ("confidence" or "boldness") occurs elsewhere in the book (3:6; 4:16; 10:19, 35). A second word, parallel in meaning to parrēsia, is plērophoria ("assurance"). Both words denote a robustness of spirit—a buoyancy of faith that is able to lay hold of the realities of the work of Christ. We should note a couple issues of interpretation. First, the term ta hagia is used in v. 19, which is translated as "the sanctuary," "Most Holy Place," "holy place," or "holy places." "Sanctuary" fits well because the passage does not specifically point to the Day of Atonement (see "Ta Hagia in Hebrews," p. 1841).

The second issue concerns the relationship between the curtain, or veil, and Jesus's body, or flesh, in vv. 19–20. Many commentators understand the flesh of Christ to be symbolic of the curtain of the heavenly sanctuary. That is, the language of the curtain expresses a spiritual truth rather than referring to the actual curtain of the heavenly sanctuary. But such an interpretation is out of sync with the apostle's sanctuary language up to this point. Throughout 8:1—10:18 he sets forth a real heavenly sanctuary with a real High Priest and a real offering (see "Behind the Veil," p. 1836). To suddenly introduce a spiritualizing note here—so that the curtain (veil) in the heavenly sanctuary is a code word for Christ's body—is asynchronous with all that has gone before.

The Greek text can be understood in a different manner, however, so that the new and living way opened by Jesus is the way of His flesh, that is, provided by His incarnation. The NEB has rightly captured the intent of the passage: "So now, my friends, the blood of Jesus makes us free to enter boldly into the sanctuary by the new, living way which he has opened for us through the curtain, the way of his flesh." A close analysis of the structure of the passage supports the NEB interpretation. Some scholars have noted the parallel structures of vv. 19–20:

Verse 19	Verse 20
a. To enter	a. A new and living way
b. The sanctuary	b. Through the veil (curtain)
c. By the blood of Jesus	c. That is, His flesh

In vv. 23–25, the apostle begins to lay out specifics of the lives of Christians who trust in the salvation promised in Christ: They will hold firmly to hope without wavering (v. 23); they will be considerate of fellow Christians, encouraging them to love and good works (v. 24); they will not neglect meeting together (v. 25); and they will encourage one another all the more as the Day approaches (v. 25). While some Christians have grown tired or neglectful, they remain firm, professing hope without vacillating (v. 23).

Thus, the problem of apathy—first broached at 2:2–9 and exposed several times subsequently—has been met head-on by the apostle. He did not merely tell his readers that they ought to be earnest Christians and attend church; rather, he laid a christological foundation for existence, in that our lives as Christians are to be shaped and continually renewed by an awareness of the person and work of Christ. To know His life of suffering and death is to know ourselves. In this passage, the apostle supplied four reasons in answer to a question of high relevance in our time: "Why go to church?" He answers: because of what Christ has done, because of who we are, because of the opportunities for mutual encouragement and growth, and because Jesus is coming soon.

10:26–31. A Strong Warning. From some of the most reassuring words of the NT to its sharpest warning—the change in tone is abrupt. The apostle tells us that entrance into the eternal future God has prepared does not follow automatically. Just as judgment fell on those who rejected God's commands in the time of Moses, so anyone who despises Christ and His sacrifice should not expect free salvation.

This oscillation from assurance to warning is a feature of Hebrews. Our study of the first severe warning (6:4–6) showed the rationale that can hold together such radically different emphases. We observed that the author's concern to set forth the magnificence of Christianity—its superiority to all that went before in the OT and that pointed to Christ—provides the key. And in that presentation, the sacrifice of Christ is the most important element. It is because of His blood (10:29) that the surpassing benefits of Christianity become available. When that blood is rightly accepted, it brings absolute confidence of our salvation; when it is treated carelessly—spurned—the case is hopeless.

The key word in 10:26–31 is hekousiōs ("deliberately" or "willfully"; v. 26). We will have to battle sin as long as we are in this world—as long as the Spirit has our old nature opposing Him. Victory in this struggle comes from Christ alone, but we must choose Him daily. Just as we first chose Him—confessing Him as Savior and Lord—so we must make our decision for Him anew every day.

In 6:4–6, the emphasis fell on the blessings once enjoyed by Christians but later rejected. In 10:26–31, it is on the prospect of fearful judgment. This change is understandable in view of the long passage of 7:1—10:18, where the apostle fully treated the work of Christ and its benefits. We note his preference for emphasizing the blood of the covenant here (10:29) rather than a description of crucifying the Son of God again (6:6); recall the weight that the motifs of "blood" and "covenant" have carried in the preceding chapters.

As we trace the series of exhortations that laminate the argument of Hebrews, we note a progression of ideas. In 2:1–4, the apostle's concern is with drifting away—neglecting the great salvation. In 3:6—4:13, it is with the gradual hardening of the heart through lack of faith. In 5:11—6:19, it is with a lack of growth in Christ and the possibility of falling away from Christ. Here, in 10:26–31, the slide reaches its lowest point: the abyss of open, willful sin, with gross insensitivity to the meaning of Christ's atoning blood. As suggested in the discussion of 6:4–6, the apostle is not attempting to set forth a theology of sin and repentance. The "if" of 10:26 sets out starkly what might be, not what has indeed happened. Nevertheless, his presentation demolishes any teaching of "once saved, always saved." Even those who have known the truth (v. 26), the blood of the covenant (v. 29), and the Spirit of grace (v. 29) may turn in wanton rejection of them. As 6:4–6 highlighted the flouting of Christian values, so 10:26–31 explains that the most important concepts of the nature of the offense are its willful, deliberate nature (v. 26), its angry trampling of Christ (v. 29), its assessing the blood of the covenant as a "common" or "unholy" thing (v. 29), and its rebellious insulting of the Holy Spirit (v. 29). Verses 28–29 recall the first exhortation (2:2–4). The reasoning is similar, but elaborated and heightened. Instead of merely neglecting, ignoring (2:3), or drifting away (2:1) from salvation, 10:26–31 describes an overt denial of the Christian faith.

10:32–39. A Valiant Past. In vv. 32–34, we catch a glimpse of the background of the readers of Hebrews. The apostle's reference to earlier times (v. 32) indicates that they had been Christian for some time—certainly several years. They had suffered terribly for their faith (v. 33), supporting those persecuted (v. 33) and in prison chains (v. 34) and having endured confiscation of their possessions (v. 34). Their being phōtisthentes (from phōtizō; "enlightened" or "illuminated"; v. 32) possibly refers to baptism; the term was so used later among Christians. It certainly indicates the knowledge of Christ that had brought them new life (cf. 6:4). After they became Christians, they had gone through great difficulties. The picture limned by the apostle is a poignant one, evoking that world when the early Christians were a small, despised, illicit sect. When abuse and hardships were heaped on them publicly, they had no civil rights to which appeal might be made. Faced with a hostile society, they found refuge in the company of fellow Christians. When subjected to physical suffering and plundering of their property, they looked to one another for encouragement and to the better, enduring possessions (10:34) in heaven.

Perhaps they faced a new threat of persecution. The apostle seems to hold out this possibility (10:35–39; 12:3–13). That thought may have been almost too much for some of them to bear. After the struggle at the dawn of their Christian life, they had enjoyed years of respite. They shrank from the prospect of a return to hard times. Perhaps this is why the apostle warned them so strongly in 6:4–6 and 10:26–31 about the possibility of their public renunciation of Christ and His cross.

The note of suffering in 10:32–34 joins a refrain that sounds throughout the NT. We hear Peter, in his first epistle, encouraging believers who were persecuted simply for being Christians; we catch Paul's remarks about sharing in the sufferings of Christ (Phil. 3:10) and of filling up in his own body what was still lacking in the afflictions of Christ (Col. 1:24; see also 2 Tim. 1:8, 3:12). Most Christians in the West cannot comprehend this aspect of the NT; it is altogether outside their experience. For Christians in other countries who do not enjoy religious freedom, this NT refrain of suffering resonates deeply.

In mentioning their sufferings, the apostle reminded them of previous times (10:32); however, Paul wanted readers to reflect on the faithfulness that they had displayed in the midst of hardships. Although he did not make the link, they were like Israel fresh out of Egypt described in chapter 3. They had begun well, but the wilderness lay before them. In 10:35–39, the backward look gives way to a forward one. Instead of wavering, shrinking back (v. 39), and losing the reward (v. 35), the readers needed patient endurance (v. 36). God's promise is sure: in just a little while the parousia would take place. Christ would come and no longer delay (v. 37).

Confidence (v. 35), endurance (v. 36), and faith (v. 38)—these three concepts overlap in exhortation. The first reminds us of the heavenly realities on which Christian life is grounded (Christ's death and High Priestly ministry). The second denotes perseverance in confidence—a steadiness of course that is able to withstand the pressures of a hostile environment and the relentless passage of time without the appearance of the long-awaited Lord. But it is the third of these, faith, which is to receive closest attention. We shall see that faith partakes of both of the above elements; it lays hold of the unseen but ultimately real, and it looks to the fulfillment of God's promises, that is, it is close to faithfulness.

When we studied the apostle's lessons drawn from Israel's wanderings in the desert (3:1—4:13), we saw how pistis ("faith") and its cognates shaped the discussion. The journeying tribes manifested un-faith (apistia); Christians, who are also striving to enter the promised "rest," are exhorted to have "faith." So here in 10:35–39 we return to the same theme—the pilgrim people of God. The reference to a better, enduring possession in 10:34 opens the door to the pilgrim theme, v. 35 tells of the reward, and v. 36 of receiving the promise. In chapter 11 this theme with its call to faith will be taken up and fully expounded.

11:1–40. Faith, the Indispensable Quality. The eleventh chapter of Hebrews is undoubtedly the best-known section of the book. It is often referred to for its definition of faith and for its depiction of the line of heroes and heroines of the OT. The passage is beautifully structured; after the two opening statements, which stand as a summary of the section, the rhythmic "by faith" pattern leads the reader forward in time. The pattern is not mechanical, however; Bible characters are not dealt with equally, and we sense movement toward a climax. With Rahab the listing breaks off, and Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah, David, and Samuel are gathered together in an onrushing statement that highlights the exploits of prophets, martyrs, and mothers. And, after the surge of this climactic summary, we hear the last, gentle melody (vv. 39–40), the final notes that bridge the years to the reader's own time.

As we attempt to understand the author's idea of faith, we should keep in mind that pistis is a word with many facets. When we move from one NT writer to another, we discern the variety of ways of setting forth this vital Christian quality. With Paul, the interpretation usually applied to pistis is essentially "trust"—trust that accepts the divine gift of salvation in Jesus Christ in an act of commitment. That trust signifies at once a turning from confidence in one's own works to an appropriation of the divine instead (see Rom. 1:17; 3:19–31; 4:1–5). With James, the use of pistis undergoes a marked shift. There we read that even the demons have it (see James 2:4–26; we must remember that "belief" and "faith" are translations of the same Gr. pistis). Here, the intellectual element is at the fore—hence James's strictures against those who have "faith" without works. In the Synoptic Gospels, the emphasis in the use of pistis changes yet again. Faith is linked to the miracle-working ability of Jesus; all things are possible to the one who has it (e.g., Mark 9:24).

This quick survey of three parts of the NT helps us to see the multihued beauty of pistis. Faith is like a diamond, gleaming in the light as writer after writer turns it for examination. Now we are better prepared to discern the facet of faith that the author of Hebrews has to show us; we are less likely to read in ideas from other parts of the NT.

The first verse of Hebrews 11 can be translated variously: "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." "Faith is confidence in what we hope for and assurance about what we do not see." "Faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen." "Faith is the reality of what is hoped for, the proof of what is not seen" (v. 1). The two clauses, though in parallel, are not repetitious. Whereas the first is time-oriented, the second is space-oriented. The first looks to the future in the certainty that hope will become reality—promise becoming fulfillment. The second, however, looks to the present reality of the invisible world, confident that the truly real is beyond the sensory.

We have met these intersecting conceptions already in Hebrews. On the one hand, the author has taken pains to assert that, while the empirical world is real, it is not the ultimate reality. An unseen, eternal world, the world of the heavenly temple where Jesus is High Priest, is the true, the genuine. The earthly sanctuary and its services were but shadows of them (8:1–5). But the flow of time also is of crucial importance: the genuine does not stand in eternal juxtaposition with the earthly. Christ becomes High Priest; likewise, while Jesus has opened the heavenly temple to all, Christians live by promise, journeying like Israel in the desert toward the Promised Land. That is why they must persevere in the way. The spatial and temporal conceptions intersect; it is the present reality of the invisible world that guarantees the fulfillment of the promise. In Hebrews 11:1 then, the author is not merely giving a definition of faith. Nor is he attempting to explain it psychologically. Rather, his statement concerning the nature of faith points to its two preeminent functions, as he sees them: it turns hope to assurance and the unseen to the "seen."

The words he uses to bring out these points are very strong. The first (hupostasis) may be rendered as "title deed," as archeological findings have shown. It is likely that such a translation captures the force of the author's intent. An illustration may help. We have never been to Hawaii, but one day the mail contains a letter. Our long-forgotten Aunt Harriet has died, leaving her property in Hawaii to us. We have never seen the land, but the property is ours. The title deed assures us that we will be able to claim it. So too is faith a title deed to the promised reward. Likewise, it is eyes that pierce through the intervening darkness to perceive the invisible world. Faith is both based on a reality and the means of seeing that reality. As we study the list of examples that follows, we will notice these two elements of faith, singly or together, that the author emphasizes in every case.

- v. 3 The creation itself is understood by faith—the sensory world results from invisible things.
- v. 4 Here is the example of Abel, whose sacrifice was accepted over his brother's because of his faith. The precise manner by which pistis was demonstrated is in question. Was it his sense of the presence of God or his hope of being accepted as righteous? The author's reference to Abel's righteousness being witnessed and commended points in the direction of the latter.
- v. 5 Enoch likewise received divine approval, showing that he had faith. The element of pleasing God probably suggests faith as both seeing the invisible and putting hope in the reward, as the following verse states.
- v. 6 This general statement applies to every seeker of God. The twin characteristics of pistis are clearly delineated here: faith believes that God exists, that is, the conviction of the invisible; and faith believes that God rewards, that is, the assurance of hope.
- v. 7 Noah likewise saw the unseen. The aspect of looking to the future also characterized his faith.
- v. 8 Here we see elements of the unseen—Abraham not knowing where he was going and looking toward the future and the coming inheritance similarly mark the pistis that he possessed.
- vv. 9–10 After Abraham's arrival in the promised land, his existence was still by faith. His living in tents contrasts with the city—which God has built. So Abraham's faith looked forward and to the invisible as he awaited the possession of the city of God.
- vv. 11–12 Sarah turned from the sensory world that had ruled out all possibility of her bearing a child in her old age. Instead she trusted in God and his promise.
- vv. 13–16 This general statement sums up the faith of the patriarchs. Once again we detect the two characteristics of v. 1, although the emphasis falls on the reality of the unseen. The language is forceful; the worthies saw the promises and welcomed them from a distance. They hoped for the future reward, which is referred to as a homeland (or lit. "fatherland"; Gr. patris)—a country of their own (v. 14), a heavenly country (v. 16), and a city (v. 16). They regarded themselves as strangers and temporary residents on the earth. With the concepts of promises, seeking, and desiring in these verses, we also discern the aspect of faith as an assurance of hope.
- vv. 17–19 Here in this reference to Abraham and Isaac, the accent falls on the future. Although Abraham offered up his son, by faith he was assured of Isaac's resurrection. But the second element is not far away: it is because Abraham believed in God's ability to raise Isaac (i.e., seeing the unseen God) that he was ready to sacrifice him.
- v. 20 Here in Isaac's blessing of Jacob and Esau, faith is predicated on the idea of a title deed of things hoped for.
- v. 21 The blessing of Jacob is likewise future-directed. Faith guarantees its fulfillment.
- v. 22 The final words of Joseph also looked to the future. They spoke of the Exodus from Egypt and of his burial in Canaan. Because faith laid hold of what was to come, his words were not merely an idle wish.
- v. 23 Because the faith aspects of the story of the baby Moses are not specified, the author may have had both elements in mind.

- vv. 24–26 Moses's rejection of the pleasures of Egypt in favor of the company of the ill-treated people of God suggests both parts of Hebrews 11:1. He looked beyond appearances; he saw a reality deeper than the honor of the court and the fleeting pleasures of sin. He looked beyond these to the future—the reward (v. 26).
- v. 27 The second aspect of faith is underscored: Moses was able to oppose the king and remain steadfast because he saw the unseen.
- v. 28 Moses's keeping of the Passover and sprinkling the blood likewise showed his confidence in the word of the unseen God—a word that called for provision for the immediate future.
- v. 29 The crossing of the Red Sea was by faith. Once again, the empirical order was set aside and the divine promise fulfilled.
- v. 30 In similar manner the walls of Jericho fell. The conviction of the reality of this unseen world made the Israelites' hope of conquest of the city sure.
- v. 31 Even Rahab is included in the list. She, too, looked to the future, though it was only a short-range one for her.
- vv. 32–38 In this summary statement of the exploits of other great figures from Israel's history, their deeds seem to be of three types: acts of unusual political or military greatness (vv. 33–34), acts outside the normal course of nature (vv. 33–35), and acts of great endurance under insult and extreme suffering (vv. 36–38).

What did the author wish to convey by this record of stirring deeds? Presumably, the manner in which faith is able to transcend the ordinary, sensory world. While these heroic men and women were part of humanity, the world was not worthy of them (v. 38). They belonged to another world: the invisible one. Because of their ability to grasp its reality—to see it—they performed these extraordinary feats. And they lived in hope of the future promise even though they did not receive it in their earthly lives; that point is made explicit in v. 39. With all their heroism—growing out of their roots in the ultimate world—they looked forward to the time when God's people all together would enter into the reward already prepared in, and made sure by, the invisible world.

Our study of the long list of examples of chapter 11 confirms the understanding of the nature of pistis arising out of v. 1. We now see how this book portrays faith in its own distinctive way. Faith in Romans and Galatians is presented as the act of trusting acceptance of the gift of salvation in Christ. In the Gospels, faith is manifested by reliance on the miracle-working power of Jesus. True faith (as opposed to dead faith) in James is presented as more than an intellectual assent. Here in Hebrews, faith is shown to be an ongoing characteristic of Christian life—a quality that enables people to persevere in the midst of hardship and, at times, against seemingly insurmountable odds. All these aspects of faith are complementary and flow out of the trust in Christ for salvation; He is the One who rewards those who seek Him. Faith is very close to faithfulness. It is an endurance rooted in the conviction of the reality of the unseen world. Therefore, it is able to appropriate as title deed the divine promises of future reward.

With our grasp of the spiritual condition of the addressees, we can appreciate the value of this emphasis. The heavenly sanctuary and liturgy—Jesus as High Priest and the superior nature of His sacrifice—all rest on the ability to see the unseen world. Only as believers look away from earthly attractions and hardships to discern the transcendent realities will they find the absolute confidence of a salvation so great. With such faith-vision they will be able to persevere in hope, no matter what difficulties may arise, knowing that the reward to come is already guaranteed by the invisible world. After the general designation of the nature of pistis in 11:1, the author stated that the ancient believers were commended for their faith (v. 2). The list of examples, from Abel to the general summary, reiterates this idea. From the understanding of the nature of pistis that the chapter revealed, we can see the reason: only by faith can the invisible God Himself be acknowledged and found.

12:1–2. Looking to Jesus. These verses are best considered as associated with the thought of chapter 11, rather than starting a new section. The Greek oun ("therefore") with which they commence indicates that the apostle wishes his readers to apply the examples of faithfulness that he has just completed. The passage deals with the race of life. Its central advice, however, is to keep our focus intently on Jesus (12:2). Although the "cloud of witnesses" (v. 1)—presumably the heroes and heroines of chapter 11—surround the runners, they are not to look to them. The exhortation is to look to Jesus. They are to run straight ahead, eyes fixed on Him—not looking back. They are not to be occupied with introspection, shutting themselves in a corner to pray and struggle over their individual weaknesses. Instead of looking to others, or to themselves, they are to dash for the finish line with eyes firmly focused on Jesus.

Are Christians here called to do what Christ has done or to trust in what He has done? The distinction is an important one. In the second chapter of Hebrews, the apostle showed how similar the human experiences of Jesus were to ours: temptation, suffering, being forsaken, death. There, however, the author did not drive home the exemplary idea at what would have been the most fitting place for it. Nor does he anywhere else in the book. His discussion of the sufferings of Jesus is to show the reality of His High Priestly ministry, not to present a pattern for Christians to emulate.

Likewise, in Hebrews 12:1-2 the apostle indicated a qualitative distinction between Jesus and us: He is both the archēgos and the teleiōtēs of our faith (v. 2). The first term denotes (and has been translated as) "Author," "Founder," "Pioneer," or "Source." In other NT passages, it can have the connotation of "Prince." The second term conveys the idea of "Perfecter," "Completer," or "Finisher." By reason of His own race of life, He has become High Priest at the right hand of God. We should note the use of the Greek preposition anti in v. 2. Most translate this as "for" (meaning "for the sake of" or "because of") which is a possible way of understanding it. This would convey the meaning that Jesus endured the shame of the cross because of the joy that would follow. An alternative translation—and one perhaps closer to the basic sense of anti—is "instead of." This results in a sharp change of meaning. Instead of the joy of the Son's preexistent status (described in 1:5-14), He took the cross and its shame, thus becoming qualified to be our High Priest. The verse then contains, in miniature, the course of the Son's career as chapter 2 outlines it.

For this section (10:19—12:2), we have employed the title "The Better Country." In view of the material it contains, it might have been designated "In Full Assurance" (10:22), "Faith," or "Exhortations to Faithfulness." Our title comes from 11:16 and picks up the pilgrimage motif of the passage. It reminds us of the leading ideas of the section: that Christians live by faith, not by sight; that the accomplishment of Christ, while it has broken down all barriers between God and humanity, has still left a waiting time for the people who live in the hope of His Second Coming; and that perseverance and endurance are therefore necessary for those who, trusting in Jesus as High Priest and Sacrifice, hold to the title deed of the better country.

The Better City

The author has come to the close of his sermon. In masterful fashion he laid the theological foundation as, step by step, he developed the high priestly argumentation. Each leading motif was briefly introduced, taken up in due course, and then rounded off. The progression of logic was steady—inexorable—as the apostle sought to show what he meant by "so great a salvation" (2:3). Over and over, he showed the superiority of Christianity with its surpassing system of worship providing decisive removal of sin and access to God. But all this theological groundwork was aimed at a practical purpose: to address the problem of spiritual anemia. If the Hebrews could come to realize the supreme value of their religion, they would not neglect it; they would certainly not turn in public repudiation of it, even though persecution might break out. On the contrary, they would persevere in the Christian way. Hence, the central word of the exhortations—that quality that the author wanted them to display above all others—is pistis ("faith"). As he brought the exhortation to a close, the author called them to steadfastness (12:1-17), briefly described the privileges they had (12:18-24), warned them (12:25-29), and advised them (13:1-9). A final benediction closes the document (13:20-25).

12:3-17. Exhortations to Steadfastness. The remainder of the apostle's call to faithfulness places the readers in the context of children being disciplined by a loving heavenly Father. The first section (vv. 3-11) provides the strongest suggestion of present suffering in the entire book. We read of the importance of enduring paideia ("discipline," "chastening," "hardship"; v. 7), which is not pleasant or joyful at the time it occurs but painful (v. 11). Verse 4 with its reference to bloodshed implies that the hardships ahead may even bring death to the followers of Jesus. The author's basic response to the problem of their suffering is in terms of divine discipline. The Greek word paideia in vv. 5-11 lies behind our English terms for education such as pedagogy. "Discipline" accurately conveys the meaning of the Greek if we understand discipline as training and not necessarily as something negative.

The apostle again turned to Scripture, quoting Proverbs 3:11-12 to show that the Christians to whom he wrote should not be surprised by their present hardship; rather, they should expect it. Then he went further, indicating that discipline serves a positive function. He showed, first, that discipline indicates that we are truly children of God (Heb. 12:7) and not illegitimate (v. 8), because God is taking an interest in us. Second, God brings discipline for our benefit, that we may have a share in His holiness (v. 10). Discipline is a training that produces the harvest of peace and righteousness (v. 11).

The manner in which the topic is broached (vv. 3-4) could have led to a very different line of response. The author referred to the exceeding sufferings of the Son (v. 2; bloodshed in v. 4 signifies death). He might have built on this, playing on Son/sons. Instead, the citation of Proverbs 3:11-12 shapes the argument: our sufferings are not taken up so much because of our commonality with the Son, who also suffered, but because God is a Father who disciplines His children. As with the advice of the Christian race (Heb. 12:1-2), the figure of Jesus serves primarily as One to contemplate, more than to emulate. While Peter, in his first epistle, acknowledges the role of Christ as our example in sufferings (1 Pet. 1:20-25), neither he nor the author of Hebrews called for Christians to measure up to or equal Christ's sufferings. Christ suffered for us in ways that we could never emulate. He is our Substitute; our own suffering could never atone for our sin—only His could. Once again, we notice the overruling hand of God in regard to the Christian experience. The apostle does not tell us the nature or source of the present hardship. Ultimately, God is behind all that happens to people (through strategic allowance as well as direct involvement) and wills an eternal purpose from the apparently chance happenings that befall them.

Hebrews 12:3-11 addresses a crushing problem of our age and of every age. It does not wrestle with the philosophical issues of good and evil; it does not develop a theodicy. Instead, it suggests a religious answer. Its teaching is that even suffering and death may serve an ultimate purpose—that a Christian called to go through the swelling of the Jordan may find a new beauty of character and awareness of the God who is Father. And it points us to Jesus, who Himself endured trial and is now enthroned as High Priest for us. Verses 12-14 sound a call to perseverance in view of the previous discussion. Again the apostle alluded to the OT: the admonition to tired hands (lit. hands that hang down) and weak knees (v. 12) is drawn from Isaiah 35:3, while that regarding straight and level paths (v. 13) comes from Proverbs 4:26. Thus, the same Scriptures that explain the reason for hardship exhort to endurance.

The fourteenth verse issues a challenge to strive for holiness. This is the same Greek word (hagiasmos; "sanctification") that the apostle in 2:11 and 10:14 spoke of as already accomplished. Again we encounter the tension between the "already"—what Christ has done—and the "not yet"—our status as pilgrims on this earth, journeying in hope.

With the third section (vv. 15-17), the apostle again raises a note of severe warning. His treatment is very brief this time, but the thrust is identical to the two earlier passages (6:4-6; 10:26-31). His treatment of Esau reminds us of his strong words earlier. In all three passages, we find the loss of something precious and the grim thought that it may be gone forever (6:4; 10:26; cf. 12:17). Whereas 6:4-6 focuses on the high privileges that have come with Jesus's salvation, and 10:26-31 on the certainty of judgment if we despise His saving death, 12:15-17 highlights the certain loss of God's spiritual blessings if we do not value them. The bitter root (v. 15) is an allusion to Deuteronomy 29:18, with its context of idol-worship. Its significance at this point is uncertain. It is interesting to note, however, that in this context the apostle returns to the language of defilement that is prominent in the book.

12:18-24. Privileges of the New System of Worship. From the darkness of Esau's rejection, the apostle turns the spotlight to full strength as he brilliantly summarizes the benefits of the work of Christ. Access (v. 22), confidence rather than fear (vv. 18-19), the new covenant (v. 24), blood (v. 24), superiority (better; v. 24)—the familiar words reappear, but not in wooden reiteration. He has shaped a passage that gathers them up into a new, creative statement that takes its place alongside the other high points of Hebrews: 1:1-4; 4:14-16; 10:18-22; 11:32-34.

The force of the contrast is unmistakable: Where "you have not come" (11:18) is significantly different from where "you have come"

(v. 22). This plays again that refrain of the superiority of Christ that we have heard over and over and is embodied in the "better" affirmations of the book. As we saw in the exposition of the system of worship, the chief religious results of this contrast are access and confidence. First, the apostle painted a picture of Mount Sinai at the giving of the law. He did not set out its grandeur but, rather, its inaccessibility and terror. It could not be approached; even a beast that touched the mountain was to be stoned or shot with an arrow (v. 20). The accompanying phenomena—fire, darkness, gloom, storm, and a terrifying voice (vv. 18–19)—made even Moses tremble with fear and caused the Israelites to beg that the frightening voice not speak to them any further (v. 19). A more vivid portrayal of lack of access and lack of boldness is difficult to imagine.

The author avoided mentioning God in his account of Sinai. Only the voice speaking words (v. 19) suggested God to the reader familiar with the account of Exodus 19–20. But not so with the new system of worship established by the blood of Christ. Through it, Christians come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem (v. 22). Now, God is truly accessible. It is not a terrifying mountain; it is the place of God Himself. It is a festal gathering where angels, saints, and Jesus Himself are present. It is a place of grace—not of fear—and all because of the blood that speaks something better than that of Abel (v. 24).

The apostle reversed the scheme of reality. From the empirical point of view, Sinai was a strong basis for religion. Here was a mountain, enveloped in phenomena to be seen and heard—if not touched! The voice that spoke laid down the will of God for humankind. What better basis for the religious life could be found? But not according to the apostle. For him, the real was for now invisible. It is appropriated by faith, not by the senses. It is access to the very presence of God, where fear dissipates and we approach with absolute confidence. But it belongs to the transcendent order.

12:25–29. Final Warning. As before, the apostle reasoned from the lesser to the greater. Those who refused to listen to the one who spoke on earth did not escape, and those who refuse Him who speaks from heaven will have even less chance to escape. While some translators and interpreters understand the one speaking on earth to be God (and thus sometimes capitalize "Him"), others imply that the reference is to Moses. The passage is exactly parallel in form and content to 2:1–4 and 10:26–31. One difference surfaces in this warning, however. Whereas the others were argued on the basis of the preciousness of the salvation provided in Christ, this one includes an eschatological factor. The superiority of Him who speaks from heaven (v. 25) at first reminds us of the Lord, who is greater than angels (2:1–4), and the Son of God, who is greater than Moses (10:26–31). The reasoning takes a new turn, however, as the author predicts a future shaking (vv. 26–27). Once again, an OT passage (Haggai 2:6) shapes the discussion. The apostle found, in the ancient text, a prophecy of a future divine judgment that was to separate the permanent—the unshakeable things—from the transient—those things being shaken (Heb. 12:27). The reasoning is as follows: God promised that He will test everything in both heaven and earth, screening out the faithful from the unfaithful. Let us therefore heed His warning lest we also come under divine judgment.

Once more the present possession of salvation is tempered by the caution that it may be lost. Any failure will not be on God's part, for the kingdom cannot be shaken (v. 28). We must beware; we may refuse to heed the divine summons (echoes of 3:6—4:13) or reject the opportunities afforded. In Hebrews, the gospel comes as a promise—a promise to be made concrete through the life of faith. So Christian life is to be a movement toward the goal; it is faithfulness—it is an offering to God in which we serve Him acceptably with reverence and deos ("awe" or "godly fear"; v. 28).

13:1–19. Sundry Advice. The author took opportunity in his closing remarks to impart jottings of practical advice that he thought the readers needed to keep in mind. The practices are all part of the life of Christian faithfulness held up before them throughout the book. The apostle's list runs the gamut of life in the world. We see, in turn, relations among Christians (v. 1), hospitality toward strangers (v. 2), concern for prisoners and the mistreated—probably fellow Christians in both cases (v. 3)—marriage and sexual relations—no praise of celibacy or denial of immorality (v. 4)—economic matters—freedom from both the love of money, resulting in covetousness, and financial anxiety (v. 5)—and the place of their leaders—following in the footsteps of their faith (v. 7).

Although it is futile to press any system upon these incidental injunctions, they do show the comprehensiveness of the Christian life. As we have seen, in Hebrews the good news comes shaped by the theology of Jesus Christ as High Priest and Sacrifice. But that "what" of His accomplishment issues in a "so what" for His followers. The author's leading concerns in exhortation are to prevent casualness, indifference, and certainly an overt rejection of Christ. Hence his accenting of pistis. The shopping list for Christian conduct suggests a wider perspective, however. It shows that the gospel projects a new way of life in the world. It is not an ethic of withdrawal from the world of society, business, and marriage; rather, it introduces in all these areas a new ethic that arises out of the great salvation (2:3) provided by Jesus Christ.

Verse 8 contains the gist of Hebrews: Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today, and forever. The apostle points to the accomplishment of Jesus already made at Calvary, to the present work of High Priestly ministry in the heavenly sanctuary, and to the parousia, when He shall enter into His eternal heirship. In v. 9, the author alludes to false teachings without elaboration. Apparently, ascetic practices are involved, since he contrasted grace with food. Then comes another statement glowing with Christian confidence: "We have an altar" (v. 10). Some exegetes see a eucharistic allusion in these words, but the statement is merely the argument related to the system of worship in a nutshell, equivalent to earlier ones (e.g., 2:18; 4:14). The polemical setting of Hebrews emerges sharply in this passage. The new system of worship in Christ is consciously opposed to the Jewish one; it is an altar from which those who serve or minister at the tabernacle (skēnē; "tent") "have no right to eat" (v. 10). We catch reverberations of the early conflict between Christianity and Judaism; the author, as elsewhere in the book, asserted the superiority of the new. His presentation strongly suggests that the temple with its services is still operative.

The apostle next draws a homiletic lesson from the sin offerings of the old system (vv. 11–13). The sin offering was handled in one of two ways: either the priest who offered it ate a portion of the flesh in the court of the tabernacle (Lev. 6:24–30), or some of the blood was brought into the "sanctuary" (ta hagia), sprinkled in front of the veil/curtain, and put on the horns of the altar of incense (Lev. 4:1–7). When the latter procedure was followed, the whole animal was carried outside the camp to a clean place and burned (Heb. 13:11–12). It is this ritual that the apostle referred to, drawing a parallel between sacrifices burned outside the camp and Jesus suffering outside the gate of Jerusalem.

The expression "outside the camp" (vv. 11–12) occurs several times in the OT (Lev. 13:46; 24:14; Deut. 23:12) in connection with the wandering tribes in the desert. It suggests an unclean place—a place of separation and death where lepers roamed, criminals were executed, and the bodies of animals used for sin offerings were burned. And that is where Jesus died. Not in the temple, not in the place consecrated for sacrifices, not even within the precincts of the holy city—but outside the gate (Heb. 13:12) on profane ground. So, says the apostle, let us join Him outside the camp, bearing reproach and disgrace with Him (v. 13).

The implications for Christian living are profound. Because Jesus died in a profane place, He removed all separations of temples and holy places on this earth. His cross has sanctified every secular spot. We no longer live in a two-compartment world of sacred and profane; all is Christ's, and our every act is to be for Christ. So the world is holy, it belongs to Him, and we are all priests—continually offering the sacrifice of praise to God (v. 15), doing good, and sharing (v. 16).

Once more, for the last time, the apostle refers to the city (v. 14). Unlike 12:22, where he could say that Christians have already come to Mount Zion—to the city of the heavenly Jerusalem—here he states that we are seeking the one (that is, city) to come in the future (v. 14). There is no contradiction. He again expresses the tension between the "already" of Christ's accomplishment and the "not yet" as we eagerly wait for His return. The list of sundry exhortations closes with an appeal for submission to those in positions of leadership (v. 17–18) and prayer for the author himself (vv. 18–19). The Greek verb hēgeomai, used in regard to the leaders in v. 17, expresses the idea not so much of ruling but of leading and guiding. The responsibility of such leaders is to keep watch over their souls, that is, to care for them and to do it with joy instead of grief. Believers are called to trust (peithō; "to be persuaded," "to have confidence in," "to depend on") and submit (hypeikō; "to yield," "to submit") to them.

13:20–25. Benediction and Closing. The benediction (vv. 20–21) contains the only direct reference to the resurrection of Christ in the entire document, though it is alluded to implicitly by references to Christ sitting down triumphantly at the right hand of God immediately following His earthly life and atoning death (1:3; 10:12; 12:2).

The Shepherd/sheep (v. 20) motifs do not occur earlier. The author very likely calls upon liturgical language familiar to his readers; its motifs of blood and covenant (v. 20) recall the major ideas of his argumentation. Only in the closing verses (vv. 22–25) do we find personal marks characteristic of the epistolary form. They are not sufficient to change our conception of the work as a whole. It is, as the writer says, a word or message of exhortation (v. 22). Indeed, it is a masterfully wrought sermon, wherein theological exposition lays the basis for practical instruction. The great salvation (2:3) is to give the addressees full assurance (10:22) and hope for faithful Christian living in anticipation of the return of their High Priest from the heavenly temple.

The Theology of the Sanctuary in Hebrews

The book of Hebrews makes an important contribution to the biblical understanding of the work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary and, consequently, to the Adventist understanding of the sanctuary doctrine. Hebrews is in fact critical to the Adventist theology of the sanctuary.

First, it provides the clearest evidence in Scripture for the existence of the heavenly sanctuary. Although we find many biblical passages referring to the temple in heaven, Hebrews states the case categorically in 8:1–2: there is a true tabernacle or tent in heaven, where Christ serves as our High Priest.

Second, it informs us that Jesus is our great High Priest, who conducts an ongoing ministry in the heavenly sanctuary. He mediates our access to God (10:20); grants us cleansing and holiness (9:14) and mercy and grace (4:16); and equips us to be victorious over temptation (2:18; cf. 13:20–21). Although Hebrews does not detail everything that ministry entails, it clearly describes it as intercession or mediation (7:25; 9:15) and assures us that Christ's ministry is effective because of the once-for-all, all-sufficient sacrifice of Himself (9:13–14; 10:11–12). We may therefore be confident that divine history did not come to a close at Calvary. Heaven is active on behalf of a world in distress as God works out His purposes for a glorious finale at the Second Coming of Jesus.

Third, Hebrews points out our need of cleansing. Sin has defiled us; we are unclean in the sight of a holy God (1:3). With this emphasis Hebrews takes us back to the book of Leviticus, where defilement and purification are major motifs. It likewise echoes Daniel 8:14, which predicts the eschatological cleansing of the sanctuary.

Fourth, Hebrews indicates that the death of Jesus on the cross has cosmic ramifications. Throughout Hebrews, the apostle underscores the power and efficacy of Calvary. On the cross Jesus defeated the devil, delivered His followers from the fear of death, and brought the Mosaic system of sacrifices to an end. His death provided thorough cleansing from sin. But Hebrews goes further: it indicates that the heavenly sanctuary itself needed cleansing through the sacrifice of Christ (9:23).

This verse, indicating the need for cleansing of heavenly things, has caused great puzzlement among interpreters of Hebrews. For Seventh-day Adventists, however, it is not mysterious. Our understanding of the cosmic conflict sees the need for God's salvation plan to set right not just the earth but the entire universe. Christ's better sacrifice was for the purpose of cleansing all things—both in heaven and on earth.

Thus, the book of Hebrews plays an indispensable role in the Adventist theology of the sanctuary. Although it does not elaborate on every aspect of Christ's two-phase heavenly ministry (daily and annual), it indicates the close of His work of mediation with the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary followed by the Second Coming of Christ (9:23–28). The connection with judgment, although present, is not emphasized. Hebrews tells of the judgment to come (2:2–3; 3:12, 17–19; 4:1, 11–13; 6:7–8; 10:26–31; 12:25–29; 13:17), and places it in the context of the cleansing of the heavenly temple and the coming of Christ (9:23–28). It is only by bringing Leviticus, Daniel, and Revelation together with Hebrews and many other biblical passages that we arrive at our doctrine of the ministry of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary.

JAMES

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The earliest copies of this letter bear the simple title: "The Epistle of James." Later scribes indicated their recognition of its sacred nature by describing it as a "holy epistle," and/or by referring to James as an "apostle" or a "holy apostle."

Who exactly was this James? The answer to this question is not entirely clear; he describes himself only in general terms as a servant "of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (1:1). There are at least five people named James in the NT: (1) James the son of Zebedee (Mark 1:19) and brother of John the apostle (Matt. 4:21), who was martyred about A.D. 44 (Acts 12:2); (2) James the son of Alphaeus—one of the Twelve (Mark 3:18)—who is not that prominent in the NT; (3) James the Less—which means the less well-known or the "smaller" or "younger" (Mark 15:40), whose mother seems to be more prominent than he is since she is often mentioned in the synoptic passion narrative (cf. Matt. 27:56; Mark 16:1; Luke 24:10); (4) James the father of Judas Thaddaeus (Luke 6:16; cf. Matt. 10:3), a relatively unknown apostle; and finally, (5) James the (half-)brother of Jesus (Mark 6:3; Gal. 1:19) and the brother of Jude (Jude 1), who played a prominent leadership role in the account of the early church in Acts.

Since the author was prominent enough to be recognized among the Christian community by the simple designation "James," the mostly likely candidate is James the (half-)brother of Jesus (Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18; Gal. 2:9, 12; see "The Brothers of Jesus," p. 1252). This has been a common assumption throughout the history of the church and is even reflected in the titles of a handful of extant manuscripts of the epistle itself.

The NT gives the following information about James the brother of Jesus: he was an unbeliever before Jesus's resurrection (John 7:5); Christ appeared to him after His resurrection (1 Cor. 15:7); after Paul's conversion, James received a visit from him (Gal. 1:18–19); he was considered a pillar in the church in Jerusalem (Gal. 2:9); he presided over the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:13–19); and he received Paul after his missionary trip and urged him to respect the Jewish customs (Acts 21:17–21).

The Epistle of James also has strong similarities to James's speech recorded in Acts 15:13–21. For example, the greeting in James 1:1 (chairein) is identical to the greeting given in Acts 15:23, likely also by James. The word episkeptomai (to "visit" or "look after"; James 1:27) appears in Acts 15:14. The term "turning" (epistrephō), which describes a sinner who comes to God (James 5:20), also appears in James's address in Acts 15:19. Finally, the term onoma ("name") is used in James 2:7 and in Acts 15:17. Clearly, a good case can be made to support the view that James the brother of Jesus is the author of the book of James.

Date. Since the letter itself does not state when it was written, two options have been proposed for its date. Some scholars advocate an early date—sometime in the mid to late A.D. 40s. This view is based on the following reasons: the distinctively Jewish nature of the letter (e.g., 1:1; 2:2, 8–13, 21, 25; 4:4); the absence of any reference to the conflict between Jews and Gentiles, which would be expected if the letter was written after the Jerusalem Council; the economic conditions of the poor (5:1–6) reflecting the social demographic of the church in its earliest years; and the thought that the simplicity of theological expression—including the absence of an explicit Christology—also fits best with the earliest decades of the church.

Those who favor a later date suggest it was written shortly before James suffered a martyr's death in A.D. 62. In support of this view, they claim the following: Paul's teaching on justification needed to be in circulation for a considerable time in order for James to respond to its misunderstanding, and the challenges of worldliness that James was confronting in the letter reflect the sort of typical problems that would confront a second generation of believers (4:1–7). Concerns about worldliness, however, hardly need a long period of time to develop. While a definitive conclusion cannot be reached regarding the date of the letter, the evidence makes the earlier date seem more probable.

Backgrounds. James has been included among the so-called General or Catholic (meaning "universal") Epistles of the NT because it does not address a specific audience. Yet the letter was intended for a specific audience, namely, the twelve tribes in the Diaspora. James referred to his readers as the twelve scattered tribes (1:1). This is a rather ambiguous designation. Some suggest that this term is a metaphorical way of referring to Christians in general (cf. 1 Pet. 1:1), while others suggest that it would be more natural to regard the intended readership as Jewish Christians based on the following internal evidence: (1) the way in which the OT law is mentioned (1:25; 2:8–13); (2) the reference to their meeting place as a synagogue (2:2); (3) the teachers and elders as leaders of the group (3:1; 5:14); (4) the oppression of the addressees by the rich non-Christians (2:6–7); and (5) the suggestion that most of the readers were poor (5:1–6).

The phrase "scattered abroad" or "scattered among the nations" (Gr. diaspora) was used to denote Jews living outside the Holy Land (cf. John 7:35; see commentary on 1 Pet. 1:1–2). Acts tells us of Christians from Jerusalem who were "scattered" (diaspeirō) because of persecution connected with the stoning of Stephen. They traveled as far as Phoenicia, Cyprus, and Antioch, and preached to only the Jewish people (Acts 11:19). Identifying James's readers with these early Jewish Christians would fit the early date of the letter and explain why it was written. James—the leader of the Jerusalem church—wanted to minister to his scattered flock and could do so only by a written letter.

Theology and Purpose. The epistle does not contain any christological reflection, and there is no doctrinal development. The lack of christological discussion is so striking that Martin Luther held the epistle in lowest esteem and called it a "straw epistle." James stresses sound deeds and not just orthodoxy or sound doctrine, regardless of Luther's evaluation. The book is characterized by its very strong practical and moral religion. Its emphasis on morals is similar to that of Jesus's teachings. In fact, it has a strong similarity with the teachings found in Jesus's Sermon on the Mount (cf. humbleness in James 4:10 and Matt. 5:5; judging in James 4:11–12 and Matt. 7:1; swearing in James 5:12 and Matt. 5:34–37). James is merely applying the teachings of Jesus to the life of the early church. Good works are considered a manifestation of our faith. As Calvin rightly observed: "We are justified by faith alone, but the faith that justifies is not alone."

The epistle provides an overview of the Christian life and emphasizes that all aspects of it are to be lived in submission to the Lord. It speaks about patiently facing trials (1:2–4); the importance of speaking the truth (vv. 16–27); the inappropriateness of showing partiality (2:1–13); the profitability of faith manifested in good works (vv. 14–26); the power of the tongue (3:1–12); the characteristics of humility and dependence on God (chap. 4); the perversion of treasures (5:1–6); and perseverance in trials (vv. 7–20). Thus, James as a whole is an ethical book stressing the practical and moral side of Christianity.

Several reasons for writing the epistle of James can be derived from the text: to comfort persecuted believers (1:2–4, 12); to commend "pure" religion (v. 27) and to convict the mere professors of faith who were not "doers" of faith (2:14–26); to exhort the audience about controlling their tongues (3:1–12), the value of humility (4:1–12), and dependence on God (4:13—5:6); and to offer prayer for the afflicted (5:13–18). Hence, the aim of the letter—like the Sermon on the Mount—is to set forth a life lived according to God's will. Living this type of life demonstrates that believers are patiently waiting for the realization of the Christian hope—the coming of the Lord (5:8), when the Lord will give them the crown of life (1:12).

Literary Features. This epistle represents a Jewish way of expression because of how figures of speech (3:6), illustrations (1:11), emphasis (2:9), and proverbs (e.g., 1:5, 19; 3:13–18) are used. Thus, the book of James has been called the "Proverbs of the New Testament." It is written in high quality Greek, but the syntax remains Semitic. In addition to being written to a wide audience of Jewish believers, it is highly impersonal and encyclical in nature. Unlike the Pauline letters, there are no personal references, greetings, or prayer requests in the entire book.

COMMENTARY

1:1–27

Greeting and Introductory Topics

The first section of James consists of a greeting (1:1) and a discussion of key topics that James will mostly return to for further development and discussion. These introductory topics include trials (vv. 2–4), wisdom (vv. 5–8), poverty and wealth (vv. 9–12), faith and testing (vv. 13–18), God's word (vv. 19–25), and true religion (vv. 26–27).

1:1. Greetings. We have suggested that James was one of the brothers of Jesus (see James: Introduction; cf. Gal. 1:19). He likely chose not to mention his natural kinship with his half-brother Jesus, since by this time Jesus was the exalted Lord, known by faith and crowned with "glory" (2:1). Thus, James describes himself as only a doulos ("servant," "bondservant," or "slave"). This implies obedience, humility, and loyalty, but also authority. In the OT, leaders were often called servants of God (2 Sam. 7:5; 1 Kin. 8:53; Jer. 7:25; Amos 3:7; Zech. 1:6). This term came to denote the ministry of service in the church.

James addresses his readers in terms of both their status and location. They are the twelve tribes scattered abroad. The twelve tribes reflect the historical origins of Israel, made up of the descendants from the twelve patriarchs (Acts 7:8). As a result of the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, most of the tribes were exiled and scattered all over the Mediterranean world. The phrase "scattered abroad" translates a Greek phrase that literally means "in the diaspora." "Diaspora," or "Dispersion," became the technical name to refer to the displacement of Jewish people living in the nations outside of the Holy Land (John 7:35). James uses that terminology here in a figurative sense—referring, most probably, to Jewish Christians dispersed as a result of persecution (Acts 11:19).

1:2–4. Trials and their Purpose. James immediately launches into his first major topic: the genuineness of faith will be tested. The readers are addressed as his brothers (and sisters) (cf. 1:16, 19; 2:1, 5, 14; 3:1, 10, 12; 4:11; 5:7, 9–10, 12, 19), an affection restricted to those within the church. He invited his readers to wrestle with the paradox of beginning to consider it a joy when facing trials. It is paradoxical in that it is to be applied to a situation in which a joyful reaction would be most unnatural. The term "trial" can refer to inner enticement to sin (1:12–15) or to the affliction of persecution (cf. 1 Pet. 4:12). In this context, the various trials could include financial poverty (James 1:9–11), economic and religious persecution (2:6–7), or illness (5:14).

James is not saying that there will not be a component of sorrow in trials. The reason for the joy is found in the fruit it induces: patience (v. 3), maturity (v. 4), and wisdom (v. 5). The Greek word for "testing" (dokimion; v. 3) is often used to refer to the process by which silver or gold is refined by fire (see LXX Ps. 12:6; Prov. 27:21). This is probably the intended meaning. Suffering is a means by which faith—tested in the fires of adversity—can be purified and thus strengthened. The idea is not that trials determine if a person has faith or not, but the intended outcome is patience/perseverance. But perseverance is not the final goal, because it contributes to the process of making believers teleios (v. 4). This word (which denotes "maturity" or "perfection") is a key term in James (1:4 [twice], 17, 25; 3:2) and, together with the following descriptive term ("complete"), points to full Christian development (see Matt. 5:48; 19:21). Mature Christians are the end-product of trials. Only then will Christians "lack nothing" in their panoply of virtues.

1:5–8. Wisdom, Prayer, and Faith. Structurally, this passage is linked with the previous one by the use of the word leipō ("to lack"; vv. 4–5). James, at this point, moves from moral integrity to wisdom. His readers already know that trials experienced with perseverance will mature Christians so that they may lack nothing. But a question immediately arises: where can one get the wisdom to interpret these trials in the right way? James's answer is that believers should ask God, who will give abundantly and without rebuke (v. 5). The imperative verbal form used here implies a command for people to ask if they truly wish to obtain wisdom.

Wisdom, generally speaking, is the ability to make sound judgments; but the wisdom about which James writes is divinely given (cf. Prov. 2:6) and bears the character of God (James 3:17). This wisdom is not obtained by pursuing suffering but is acquired by asking. God provides what He demands. Wisdom as God's gift to believers enables them to see personal experiences from a divine perspective. The person who asks for wisdom must remember two things: how God gives and how they must ask. James tells us that God gives abundantly and unreservedly without rebuke or reservation. Unlike pagan gods or human beings, God's giving is not devious; it comes with no strings attached. God's willingness to hear and respond to His children's call in their need is well-attested in the teachings of Jesus (Matt. 7:7a; cf. Luke 11:13).

Suffering, maturity (perfection), and wisdom are linked together in the Christology of the NT (Heb. 5:8–9). Paul describes Christ as the manifestation of God's wisdom (1 Cor. 1:24). In Christ, God gave the best He had without reservation.

The other side of the transaction is how one should petition. James tells us that Christians should believe God and trust Him; the request must be made in faith (James 1:6). Doubt is a form of passing judgment on God's word and thus the opposite of faith. James means not that believers may never have a measure of uncertainty regarding God's will but that they should not question the integrity of God. Doubters are depicted as a wave susceptible to change and manipulation because they lack sufficient grounding.

The warning in v. 7—that doubting people should not anticipate receiving anything from the Lord—refers to an action in progress. James commands readers to stop toying with the thought of asking God while questioning God's integrity. Such a person is "double-minded" (v. 8), suffering from what could be called "spiritual schizophrenia." The double-minded person is ultimately trying to serve two masters. Such a person is unstable in everything (v. 8). Without a firm faith, life is chaotic—lacking stability.

1:9–12. Poverty and Wealth. This section is considered an opening salvo against wealth in light of the even harsher language of 5:1–6. The main problem seems to be not wealth itself but certain attitudes toward it. Humble people are contrasted with the rich, which suggests that James is dealing not with the issue of a humble attitude but with that of a humble position. Many early Christian believers were from among the poor and could "boast" in their humble circumstances only because they knew of the eschatological reversal, when they would experience the "high position" (1:9; cf. Luke 16:25).

Verses 9–10 could lead us to initially think that the rich people were also members of the Christian community. The "rich" in v. 10 is most naturally related to "adelphos ("brother," a believer) in v. 9, and parallel to "humble." The community to which James was writing might at least have had within it some who were fairly well-off, able to travel on business and brag about the prospects of making money (4:13–17). In other passages, however, James describes "rich" people as wicked oppressors of the people of God (2:1–6; 5:1–6). Thus, many interpreters think that the rich people must have been non-Christians.

Regardless of whether the rich people here are Christians or not, the meaning of vv. 10b–11 is clear: riches are worthless in the face of death and judgment because rich people—along with their riches—are ephemeral. The botanical comparison is unmistakable; as go the flowers, so will the rich people go (v. 10). In v. 11, the author continues discussing the topic of the transitory nature of life. As a whole, the passage echoes Jeremiah 9:23–24. Wealth, according to James, can lead a person to arrogance, pride, ruthlessness, and faith in oneself instead of in God. Wealth can also lead a poor person to envy and obsequiousness. It is not wealth that is the problem but the rich person's attachment to it and the poor person's lust for it.

With v. 12, James returns to the topic of trials discussed earlier and forms a verbal bracket with 1:2–3. The verse is expressed like a beatitude (see Matt. 5:3–12; Luke 6:20–23). The word "blessed" (v. 12) does not mean quite the same as the English word "happy." The latter refers to a present emotional state, whereas the former refers to wholeness in relation to God and has its primary manifestation in the future. In this verse, this future manifestation is called the "crown of life" (cf. Rev. 2:10), that is, the crown that is life.

1:13–18. Faith and Testing. The catchword that connects v. 12 with this section is peirasmos ("testing," "trial," or "temptation"). In the context of a strong belief in God's sovereignty, it is easy to fall into the trap of blaming God for one's own failure. Therefore, James commands his audience not to give way to the thought that God is tempting anyone (v. 13). The Greek verb peirazō (related to the noun peirasmos) expresses both of the ideas of testing and temptation. In v. 13, there is a shift from the external push (testing) to sin toward the internal pull (temptation). Of course, sometimes trials are followed by temptations. For example, financial difficulty can tempt some to question God's providence in their lives. The suffering of the righteous poor and the ease of the wicked rich can tempt one to question

God's justice. However, while God allows testing through external pressure, He does not try to lure people into sinning. James says that God cannot be tempted by evil, nor does He tempt anyone (v. 13b). Temptation is an impulse to sin, but since God is not susceptible to any such desire for evil, He cannot be seen as desiring that for humans. Thus, James describes God's incapacity for evil as a passive and active agent.

The ability to tempt and to be tempted is rooted in an evil disposition within each person (v. 14). The illustration used is evocative of fishing and hunting, then continued with the imagery of sexual reproduction (v. 15). Sin is not the end in itself, but it produces death—the offspring of sin. James has presented several different sequential chains: such as testing, endurance, perseverance, and maturity (1:2–4); and testing, endurance, perseverance, and life (1:12). Here, we are presented with another sequential chain: desire, sin, and death. James expresses that the immense magnetism of desire and the genealogy of sin is not traced further than the person's own desire. The admonition "stop being deceived" (v. 16) warns readers to stop being deceived (lured) by temptation.

While temptation could eventually take life away from a person, God gives good and perfect gifts from above (v. 17). He generously gives wisdom from above (1:5; cf. 3:15). He is the Father of lights since He is the Creator of the celestial lights (Gen. 1:14–18). Ordinary lights produce shadows, but God's light is shadowless. Given the instability of the world in which the nascent community of believers lived, the reliability of God's wisdom was a stable corollary. Just as God brought forth the heavenly lights, so He also brought forth believers by the logō alētheias ("word of truth"; v. 18). All four occurrences of this phrase (sometimes translated as "truthful speech," "message of truth," or "true message") in the NT refer to the gospel as the agent of salvation (2 Cor. 6:7; Eph. 1:13; Col. 1:5; 2 Tim. 2:15). The word is the instrument through which God brings people to life to be "a kind of firstfruits" (James 1:18). The firstfruits were the finest produce set apart as an offering to God (Ex. 23:19). So, the early Christians were to be the beginning of God's redemption of all creation (Rom. 16:5; 2 Thess. 2:13; Rev. 14:4).

1:19–25. Doing God's word. The connection between what preceded and what follows in this section is the idea of the truthful word or message (v. 18); the word planted in believers (v. 21); the word (v. 22–23); and "the perfect law" of freedom (v. 25). This section begins with a number of sentences that have a proverbial character. Everyone should be quick to listen, slow to speak, and slow to anger (v. 19). What should the audience be quick to hear? The object of the command seems to be the "word of truth" (v. 18) or, simply stated, the word of God. However, such hearing results in being slow to speak and slow to anger. Controlling the tongue is a major component of true faith (1:26; 3:10; 4:11). James here echoes wisdom teachings (cf. Prov. 17:28; 29:20). He even explains why Christians should be slow to become angry. Anger does not produce the righteousness of God (v. 20). To produce righteousness seems to mean to do that which God requires from His people. The combination of the verb "do" or "produce" with the noun "righteousness" makes it very difficult to think that James was referring to God's act or gift of righteousness (cf. Matt. 5:20). James's point here is that human anger does not produce a behavior that is pleasing to God (cf. Eph. 4:26).

James touches on four aspects of hearing/receiving God's word: first, the proper preparation for receiving the word (remove all filth and rampant evil); second, the required attitude (humility/meekness); third, the thing to be received (the implanted word); finally, the expected results (salvation; v. 21). The metaphor of putting off evil is common (Rom. 13:12; Eph. 4:22, 25; Col. 3:8; Heb. 12:1; 1 Pet. 2:1; cf. Zech. 3:3–4). The reference to filth seems to assume that the audience has not just a few peccadilloes that must be disposed of but a multitude. The Greek word prautēs in James 1:21 ("meekness," "humbleness," "gentleness") stands in contrast to slander (Titus 3:2) and is commended by Jesus as part of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. 5:23). The implanted word reminds us of the gospel through which the believer was given birth (James 1:18) and which is to take root in the believer's life. The outcome of such implantation is salvation.

The one hearing the word of God, James argues, must also act on it. Listening to the word must lead to doing. Both Jesus and Paul also contrast the hearer of the word with the doer (cf. Matt. 7:24–27; Rom. 2:13–16). Those who merely listen deceive themselves (cf. James 1:22, 26). Furthermore, James contrasts the hearer and the doer in what they look at, how they look at it, and what the result of their looking is. The hearer looks at his face in the mirror (v. 23), while the doer looks at the "perfect law" of liberty and freedom (v. 25). Hearers look hastily at their face but forget what it looked like (v. 24); doers look intensely into the law and act on it (v. 25). Hearers remain unchanged because of their superficial glance at themselves, while doers are changed since they act, receiving a blessing in what they do.

James shifts from the "word" (vv. 21–23) to God's "law" (v. 25)—probably because they refer to the same thing. The word nomos ("law") is the Greek equivalent to the Hebrew torah. The torah comprises not just legal statutes but also the teaching of Scripture. The statement "perfect law" goes back to Psalm 119:43, which refers to the torah as "the word of truth" (cf. Ps. 19:7). It is perfect because God is its originator. Later in the letter, James will call it the "royal law" (2:8).

1:26–27. True Religion. Two ties link this section with what has gone before: first, the introduction of the sin of rash speech (v. 19) and, second, the discussion of being not merely hearers but also doers. In both this and the previous section, self-deception plays a significant role. The three manifestations of pure religion mentioned here—to which James will later return—are controlling the tongue (1:19–20; 3:1–12; 4:11–12), showing concern for the helpless (2:1–13, 15–16; 5:1–6), and avoiding worldliness (4:4–10). The problem with the audience of James seems to rest with people who could not control their tongue—the control of which represents the virtue of self-control.

According to James, what God desires is a religion which is katharos ("pure") and amiantos ("undefiled" or "faultless," two synonymous adjectives). The word translated "religion" (thrēskeia) can also be translated "worship." While worship is usually associated with religious rituals that occur as part of a church service, James reminds his hearers that it encompasses much more than that. It is seen in how we episkeptomai ("visit," "look after," "seek out"; Acts 6:3), or care for (Heb. 2:6), the orphans and widows in their affliction (James 1:27). These two social classes are frequently connected in Scripture because they represent those most vulnerable to exploitation (cf. Deut. 10:18; Is. 1:17; Ezek. 22:7; Mark 12:40; 1 Tim. 5:3–16). Because of their situation, they are identified as special recipients of God's concern, care, and protection (Deut. 10:18; Ps. 68:5). Like the prophets of old, James declares that religious ritual and liturgy can never substitute for sacrifice and service to those who are in need.

The second aspect of pure religion acceptable to God involves keeping oneself from being stained by the world (James 1:27). To keep unstained from the world does not mean that we are to withdraw from it. It is a call to avoid being influenced by the corrupt values of the world that stand in opposition to the way God would have us live.

2:1—5:18
Detailed Thematic Expositions

In the main portion of the letter, James develops most of the themes already discussed and introduces new ones. The emphasis is on how to live the Christian life in a way that corresponds to the will of God and that will bring glory to Him.

2:1–7. Favoritism. James applies many of the key ideas discussed before (1:19–27) to the discrimination of the poor within the church. The object of his concern is partiality or favoritism. The Greek term prosōpolēmpsia comes from the Hebrew term nasa' panim (lit., "lifting up the face") and connotes regarding someone with special favor. In this passage, it means to make judgments about people based on external appearance. The OT condemned such an attitude (Deut. 10:17–18; Prov. 18:5; Mal. 2:9; cf. Acts 10:34). It was Paul's conviction that Gentile and Jew stand under a like judgment in the sight of God, for with God there is no favoritism (Rom. 2:11). Since favoritism mirrors the standards of the surrounding culture, it is an obvious example of being stained by the world's way of thinking (James 1:27). By falling into the sin of partiality, one denies their adherence to their glorious Lord, Jesus Christ (2:1). The phrase used here can be read as "the Lord of glory" or more literally as "of the glory." This suggests that "of the glory" functions as a title of Jesus. He is "our Lord Jesus Christ, the Glory." This phrase is a rare example of Christology in the book of James that identifies Jesus with the Shekinah, the visible manifestation of the glory of the divine presence in the holy of holies (cf. Ex. 25:8; 40:34; 1 Kin. 8:10).

The case of favoritism James alludes to involves two people coming to the same meeting but being treated differently. Although it is introduced as a hypothetical situation, the specificity of the passage, especially in 2:6, suggests that it reflects actual events. The "assembly" or "meeting" where these two individuals come is referred to as a synagōgē in Greek—the place where Jews met together for both worship and community matters. Its identification as "your synagogue" or "your meeting/assembly" could suggest an early time in the church when Jews and Christians still met together. The first person who entered was well-dressed and wore a gold ring, indicating a high social status. The second individual, however, was a poor person who entered wearing filthy or shabby clothes. The rich person was offered a seat of honor, whereas the poor person was disdainfully tolerated. "At my footstool" or "by my feet" (v. 3) suggests that the poor person was considered to be socially beneath the other. Paying attention to outward appearance is one of the primary ways of showing favoritism.

Although James describes the meeting as occurring in a synagogue, the nature of the gathering may not have been for communal worship. It could have been a gathering to decide a legal issue, a judicial proceeding. While it might appear strange to us today, synagogues were used as courts of laws where Jewish communities could settle their own issues internally (cf. Luke 12:11). Early Christians had a similar practice (cf. Matt. 18:15–20; 1 Cor. 6:1–16). The use of legal language seems to support this suggestion. James describes, for example, Christians who discriminate in this manner as "judges with evil thoughts" (James 2:4) and later refers to believers dragging fellow believers into court (v. 6).

Whether it occurs within the church or society, James proceeds to explain why favoritism and all forms of discrimination are wrong (vv. 5–7). They contradict God's own attitude, as revealed in His treatment of the poor. In Jesus's first sermon in the synagogue in Nazareth, He claimed that God had anointed Him to preach good news to the poor (Luke 4:18). Paul told the Corinthians that not many of them were wise or powerful according to worldly standards (1 Cor. 1:26). It is not that Christ and the church do not want the rich and the wise and the mighty. They should all be treated with Christian respect. There is no inherent virtue in poverty. But James encourages the church to show concern and honor for the poor and helpless as God does.

James does not condemn riches but the conduct of some rich people. Three charges in particular are mentioned: they oppress or exploit (v. 6); they drag people into court (v. 6); and they blaspheme the noble name by which they are identified (v. 7). The prophets often denounced rich people who oppressed the poor (Amos 4:1). In the time of James, the rich would drag the poor to court because of their debts, rents, and wages and the prevalence of usury. The charge of blasphemy could refer to slander, but it usually has a religious nuance, involving the profane abuse of sacred things—especially impious speech (cf. Matt. 9:3). The rich are not just blaspheming the poor but the name by which they are called. Christians are named after Christ to whom they belong and whom they acknowledge as their glorified Lord (2:1).

2:8–13. Discrimination and the Royal Law. Showing favoritism is sin (2:9), and it makes the one who shows favoritism as much a lawbreaker as the murderer and the adulterer. This section concludes with two reminders. First, we will be held accountable for what we say and what we do (2:12). Second, mercy has greater weight than judgment (Luke 6:36), and those who expect to receive mercy must likewise exhibit mercy (James 2:13). James's references to the law and judgment are reminiscent of Jesus's instruction (Matt. 22:39). Jesus quoted Leviticus 19:18 as the second greatest commandment, and James reminds his hearers that the command to love summarizes a series of commands in Leviticus that includes a prohibition against partiality (Lev. 19:15). James 2:10—pointing out that to transgress one part of the law is to transgress the whole—echoes Matthew 5:19. The concluding verses (vv. 12–13) echo the beatitude in Matthew 5:7, as well as Jesus's parable of the unforgiving servant (Matt. 18:23–35).

James refers to the law as the "perfect law" of liberty (1:25), the "royal law" (2:8), and the law that provides freedom (2:12). God's law is complete, kingly, and liberating. The use of law (nomos) instead of "command" (entolē) makes it appear decisive that the whole Law of God is intended, rather than a single commandment. The reference to two of the Ten Commandments—adultery and murder—indicates that when James spoke about the perfect law of liberty and the royal law he had in mind the Decalogue and that he considered it to be a moral guide for Christians. The Law summarized in love is "royal" because it is the "law" of the kingdom of God.

2:14–26. Faith and Works. Not only is this section the best-known, but it also receives the most extended treatment of any subject in the letter. It is so well-known because many claim that James's insistence on the importance of works (deeds or actions) in relationship to being justified (or considered righteous) by faith (2:24) contradicts Paul's declaration that a person is "justified by faith" apart from the works of the law (Rom. 3:28). While the two apostles certainly use the same terminology in different ways, on closer examination the contradiction is only apparent. The difference between the two is the result of different concerns, different backgrounds, and different audiences.

The discussion of faith is divided in three subsections: faith without works is dead (James 2:14–17); genuine faith involves more than just mental consent (vv. 18–19); and (3) Abraham and Rahab illustrate that genuine faith is expressed in good works (vv. 20–25). James had already condemned the double-minded person whose faith waffles between God and something else (1:6–8) and now develops it further.

Faith without works is dead (2:14–17). The main theme discussed in the second half of chapter 2 relates to a faith that is inactive and therefore ineffective, dead, and worthless. In Greek, the second use of the term faith in v. 14 has a definite article "the faith," pointing to the previous reference to faith. The question should be understood as: "Can this [inactive] faith save him?" The reference is to the faith of a person who claims to believe in God but has no commensurate deeds. The "works" to which James refers are faith-deeds, which are as endemic to faith as breath is to the life of a human being (2:26). James expresses his concern with the failure of Christians to care for those who lack adequate clothing or daily food in the community. Well-wishing or a shalom greeting is meaningless to such persons, and the professing Christian receives no blessing from inactive faith (cf. Matt. 25:31–46).

Genuine faith involves more than just mental consent (2:18–19). James next interacts with a hypothetical interlocutor. James is opposing the notion that works and faith are separable—that works or faith are each a viable approach in one's relationship with God. He insists that they are inseparable. He also challenges the false notion that faith is simply an intellectual acceptance of doctrine (v. 19). He argues that even the demons believe that there is one God (the Shema, "hear"; Deut. 6:4), but they react to this belief with shuddering, not with submission to God. Certainly that is not an example of genuine faith.

Abraham and Rahab illustrate that genuine faith is expressed in good works (James 2:20–26). Those who attempt to separate faith from works are described as "foolish" (v. 20), probably because their faith is senseless and lacks substance (v. 26). To demonstrate his point, James gives two examples of genuine faith. First, James speaks of Abraham as being justified by the means of offering up Isaac (v. 21). This has generated much dispute since the Reformation because it seems to contradict Romans 3:28. As we noted earlier, Paul's concern in Romans and Galatians is different. His focus is on our legal standing before the eschatological tribunal of God. He expresses his interest in how God can rightly give a verdict of "just" to a sinner and how one can appropriate it. The solution offered is that the verdict is given on the basis of the believer's union with Christ, and it is appropriated by faith. Here in his epistle, James's concern is not in discussing how we are saved, but how we should live the Christian life. Genuine faith demonstrates itself in works that are viable and effective (James 2:14, 17, 20, 26). James is not saying that Abraham, by offering Isaac, was declared righteous in the Pauline sense by that event, because the declaration of Abraham's righteousness (Gen. 15) occurred several years before that time (Gen. 22). The righteousness discussed in James refers to righteous behavior (James 2:15–16). The phrase "by faith only" or "by faith alone" (2:24) clearly shows that James refers to the bogus faith that he has been attacking throughout this section. The example of Rahab, the prostitute, also demonstrates that the faith that God requires is a faith that manifests itself in good works (2:25). Like Abraham's, Rahab's faith was justified or proven to be genuine in the hospitality, protection, and help she provided for the two Israelite spies who entered her house (Josh. 2:1–21). James concludes this section by reiterating once again his observation that faith without works is like a corpse; it is devoid of life (v. 26).

Paul and James on Works and Faith

The language used by James contrasts somewhat with the way Paul refers to God's offer of salvation through faith in Christ. Often, James has been interpreted as contradicting Paul. But this is not the case.

1. Paul on Justification. When Paul says that justification is by faith alone, he is confronting the problem of legalism: the attempt of fallen humans to earn their own salvation through obedience to God's Law. In confronting legalism, Paul's focus is on the nature of salvation; how does a sinner find forgiveness and acceptance before a holy and just God? The answer is justification by faith alone: God's acceptance of humans not because of what they have done but solely because of what Jesus has done for them in His perfect life, death, and resurrection.

2. James on Works. James addresses a very different problem. His concern was not with legalism but with laxity in the Christian life—the belief that the way we act as Christians is not really that important. These individuals wrongly conclude that what matters most is that they consent to the correct religious beliefs. In dealing with this misconception, James focuses on not how a person becomes a Christian but how people should demonstrate that they are Christians (or, to put it another way, how a person who is saved by faith in Jesus should live). James is not saying that faith is meritorious. He is emphasizing that our faith should be demonstrative; it should demonstrate that we love and care for others because we have already been saved. Faith is no less important to James than to Paul. That is why James condemns the hypocritical faith that does not produce the proper behavior.

3:1–12. Teachers, Tongues, and Trouble. While the focus of the previous section was on social ethics, this section deals with the importance of proper speech. The discussion moves from the specific (wanting to teach; v. 1) to the general (control of the tongue; vv. 2–12; see 1:26).

James begins the discourse with a warning that not many of his readers should become teachers. What is the basis for his counsel? James recognizes that teaching is an important spiritual gift (cf. Rom. 12:7; 1 Cor. 12:28; Eph. 4:11). Teachers have considerable influence over the lives of others and, as a result, are often looked up to as role models. While some might desire the status of a teacher, James wants them to realize that with wider influence comes greater responsibility. In fact, teachers—and here James includes himself as well ("we")—will be judged more strictly because of their position (see Luke 12:48; cf. Num. 20:11–12). James is also concerned that too many seek the position without the required moral qualifications. Being a teacher, therefore, is dangerous because controlling the tongue—exhibiting self-discipline in what one says and does—is not easy. James acknowledges that even with our best intentions we all stumble in many ways (James 3:2). In identifying himself with his audience, James gives greater credence to his warning. Due to these challenges, only those who are self-disciplined in their speech should strive to become teachers.

James smoothly transitions from speech to the instrument that produces speech: the tongue. With a triad of vigorous illustrations, he warns against the tongue run amok. Horses are controlled by bits, ships—though driven by fierce winds—are controlled by small rudders, and a small fire can set ablaze a huge forest (v. 5). The point of all three analogies is the same: the tongue's effectual power is grossly out of proportion to its size. The tongue's potential for damage—like that of a wildfire—extends well beyond its point of origin (v. 6).

Having established the potential destructive power of the tongue, James reminds his audience of the difficult task of controlling the tongue. Different creatures from the animal kingdom have been tamed, yet the tongue is an unruly or restless evil "full of deadly poison" (v. 8). Is James suggesting that the ultimate taming of the tongue is impossible (v. 8)? He had already suggested that some people can subdue their own tongue (3:2). He now states that it is people in general who cannot subdue the tongue.

In characterizing the tongue as unruly and restless, James uses the same word employed to describe the double-minded person in 1:8. The critique of the tongue is brought to conclusion by attributing to it the duality that James so often deplores in his letter (1:8; 4:8). The duality is illustrated: it can be used to praise God and to curse human beings. Cursing a human being is evil because such a person has been made in the likeness or similitude of God (v. 9). Such a thing, while not impossible, is totally inconsistent with the Christian way of life. James considers what comes out of the mouth a barometer of spirituality (cf. Matt. 12:37). With the analogy of a spring that does not alternate between bringing forth fresh and poisonous water, or a certain kind of tree that produces only certain kinds of fruits, the point is clear: bad things do not produce good things. The ethics of pure speech are the product of a self-controlled, mature person.

3:13–18. True Wisdom Brings Peace. Just as genuine faith is distinguished from false faith by works, so heavenly wisdom is differentiated from earthly wisdom by its results. In addressing the topic of wisdom, James returns to what he first introduced in 1:5. Earthly wisdom is characterized by envy, selfishness, and disorder, while heavenly wisdom is characterized by love and peace. James assesses one's claim to wisdom in practical terms (v. 13). The concept that genuine wisdom is humble originates in the OT (see Prov. 11:2). Wisdom begins with the fear of the Lord (Prov. 1:7) and enables a person to discern what is right and just (Prov. 2:9). Humility, however, was usually not prized by the Greeks. They prized intellectual ability and knowledge of divine secrets, often to the detriment of the moral life.

The results of false wisdom are mentioned: bitter envy and rivalry (James 3:14). The term "envy" (zēlos) has a positive meaning (and can be rendered as "zeal"; cf. John 2:17) as well as a negative meaning (rendered as "jealousy"; see Acts 5:17; Gal. 5:19–20). The negative is supported here by the qualifying adjective "bitter." Since zēlos is paired with rivalry here, the word most likely refers to "envy." James warns people characterized by these negative traits to not boast and slander the truth (James 3:14). The truth is that such wisdom is not from above; it is earthly, sensual/unspiritual, and demonic (v. 15). Jealousy and selfish ambition are of demonic origin. The contrast is between a wisdom that leads to humility (v. 13) and a worldly, fleshly, and demonic wisdom.

James goes on to describe the results of the different kinds of wisdom (vv. 16–18). Demonic wisdom—characterized by jealousy and selfish ambition—results in akatastasia ("confusion" or "disorder" and all kinds of evil; v. 16). Paul comments that God approves not of akatastasia but of peace (1 Cor. 14:33). The preeminent attribute that heavenly wisdom produces, says James, is purity, from where the other attributes flow. All three adjectives—eirēnikos ("peaceful"), epieikēs ("kind," "gentle," or "considerate"), and eupeithēs ("compliant," "willing to yield," or "obedient")—show the disposition of the wise person. The nouns "mercy and good fruit" disclose the wise person's actions, while the last two adjectives—without partiality/favoritism and without hypocrisy—describe the enduring, stable, sincere, and transparent consistency of the wise person. As the capstone of the two contrasting wisdoms, one produces disorder and the other produces peace (cf. Matt. 5:9). The ambiguous phrase regarding the fruit or harvest of righteousness should be understood as fruit/harvest that is righteousness (James 3:18).

4:1–10. Lust and Repentance. Building on his commendation of those who make peace in 3:18, James turns his attention to a number of problems in the community that do not contribute to peace. Several themes already introduced are here blended together: the destructive power of speech; doubters who do not have because they do not ask; the eschatological casting down of the proud and the exaltation of the lowly; worldliness against godliness; and the strife that comes from arrogance rather than from true wisdom. This section begins not with the expected vocative "brothers"/"brothers and sisters" as other sections do (e.g., 1:2, 16, 19; 2:1) but with a rhetorical question. It ends with a summary of proverbial material (4:7–10; cf. Prov. 3:34).

In contrast to having the peace that true wisdom brings (James 3:17), some of the addressees of James were involved in a power struggle and backbiting (4:1), which characterizes the world. Battles and fights are outward manifestations of what is in the human heart and speak of a church governed by the wisdom from "below" (3:15). James identified desire as the source of these quarrels (4:1). The Greek word here is hēdonē, from whence comes the English word hedonism. The term occurs only three times in the NT (Luke 8:14; Titus 3:3; 2 Pet. 2:13), always with a pejorative connotation. These pleasures that are in conflict within can be understood as the internal struggle within a person or the external struggle among members of a community. Animosity escalates when desire is frustrated (4:2).

The terms used here, such as battles, fights, murder, and adulterers (vv. 1–4), are almost certainly hyperbolic or metaphorical (cf. Matt. 5:21–26). However, some scholars have understood killing as literally having taken place in James's community. James indeed exhorted his readers not to kill anymore (see James 2:11; 5:6). Nevertheless, the context makes it difficult to suggest that literal killing is intended. James would not have passed so quickly over such a serious issue. The killing could be related to the use of the tongue or to indifference to the needs of the poor. All these vices are the outward manifestation of self-centered desires.

"You do not have because you do not ask," James states (4:2). What is it that James's readers were wanting? The context points out that they were seeking the wisdom that would have enabled them to gain recognition as leaders in the community. James had warned them against wanting to become teachers (3:1) and against priding themselves on being "wise and understanding" (3:13). Apparently, they wanted to lead the church but did not have the right kind of wisdom. Earlier, James exhorted them to ask God for wisdom (1:5). His readers, however, were not receiving wisdom because they were not asking for the right kind of wisdom. Instead, they were asking only for what they could "spend" (dapanaō) on their own selfish gratification, to their own detriment (4:3). The word translated as "spend" means to "spend freely" in the sense of squandering. It is the same term used for the prodigal son who squandered his father's possession (cf. Luke 15:14).

The abrupt and harsh opening of James 4:4—with the vocative "adulterers" or "adulterous people" (lit., "adulteresses")—marks the beginning of the call for repentance. There is nothing in the context to suggest that the literal sin of adultery is what James was addressing. Adultery may refer to spiritual betrayal. The background of the accusation is found in the OT, where the prophets compared the relationship between God and His people to a marriage relationship (Is. 54:5–6; Jer. 2:2; cf. Matt. 12:39; 16:4). For James, the world represents an ethos of life in opposition to God and His reign. Hence, when James berates the world's "friends" as "adulteresses," he implies that flirting with the world is akin to spousal unfaithfulness.

James 4:5 is probably the most difficult text in the whole letter. The major debate concerns whether "God" or "the spirit" is the subject of the Greek verb epipotheō ("to yearn" or "to long"). In other words, is James referring to God's jealousy for His people or is he referring to the human tendency to be envious? The immediate context provides strong and decisive support for understanding it as divine jealousy. Verse 5 supports the point made in v. 4—that those James was addressing were committing spiritual adultery by following the world instead of their true "spouse," the Lord. This is corroborated by the OT evidence of God's jealousy (Ex. 20:5; 34:14; Deut. 4:24; Zech. 8:2). However, James highlights that God's grace is completely adequate to meet the requirements imposed by His jealousy (cf. Prov. 3:34).

James concludes this section with ten imperatives. The command to submit to God, placed emphatically at the beginning of the sentence, is comprised of a negative statement that calls to resist the devil (something that can be done with promising result: "he will flee from you"; v. 7)—whose main purpose is to separate God and humanity (Gen. 3:1–8). But there is also a positive statement calling believers to draw near to God—an action that will be reciprocated (4:8). The following imperatives echo a strong cultic call to purity and repentance. Both the washing of hands and the purifying of hearts allude to external behavior as well as internal attitude, which if not changed will leave a person a sinner and double-minded (v. 8). The double-minded person reminds the reader of those who are unstable—who doubt God (1:8). In this context, the double-minded is the one who seeks to be friendly with the world as well as with God (4:4). In prophetic language, unrepentant people are urged to mourn, wail, and weep (cf. 2 Sam. 19:1; Neh. 8:9; Matt. 5:4; 1 Cor. 5:2), while those laughing display the attitude of a fool (cf. Eccl. 7:6). Those who submit to God, however, will humble themselves in the Lord's presence, and He will raise them up (James 4:10; cf. Luke 18:14).

4:11–12. Defamation and Censure. Unchecked desire does not seem to be the only cause of dissension among James's readers, but also the matter of defamation and censure. Here, again, we are reminded that speech can be used for evil (3:1–12). Raging battles and wars manifest themselves in slandering brothers and sisters (4:11). James's previous harsh address to his readers as adulterers and as sinners and double-minded persons gives way now to the familiar address of "brethren" or "brothers and sisters." This terminology is used to introduce his counsel against slandering others, referring to harmful speech of incorrect accusations (1 Pet. 2:12; 3:16) or questioning someone's legitimate authority (Num. 21:5).

James claims that criticism of a fellow believer is tantamount to criticism of the law. He has in mind Leviticus 19:16–18. He assumes that slandering a fellow believer contradicts the demand to love our neighbors as ourselves (James 2:8). He contrasts judging the law with keeping or performing it. Judgment is reserved for God, who stands at the beginning and the end of redemptive history (4:12; cf. Matt. 10:28). To usurp His authority makes one a lawbreaker, because the law is not obeyed. In light of the above argument, we should not conclude that James is prohibiting the church body from disfellowshiping those who are in flagrant disobedience to the word of God (cf. 1 Cor. 5:11–12; 6:1–11). The disputes in James's community were conducted with unrestrained tongue (James 3:1–12), including perhaps cursing (3:10) and denunciations of one another (4:11–12).

4:13–17. Warning to Merchants. Those whom James now warns do not seem to be rich, but their travel plans and business expectations portray them as belonging to the well-to-do merchant class. The words quoted in v. 13 seem to be the words of self-confident people who plan where they will go, when they will go, how long they will stay, and how much profit they will make. There is nothing unethical in such plans, but James rebukes these merchants because of their secular self-confidence in pursuing their business in the face of the brevity and transitory nature of life. The tenuousness of life is a recurring theme in the OT (Job 7:7, 9, 16; Ps. 39:5–6; Prov. 27:1). James calls attention to the foolishness of making plans apart from God, because life is a "vapor," "wisp, or "mist" (v. 14). The Greek term can refer to smoke (Gen. 19:28) or a cloud of smoke (Acts 2:19). These people not only leave God out of their planning but brag about it as well (James 4:15). Such boasting is evil (v. 16).

Instead, believers should acknowledge that God is sovereign in life, and one should consciously seek to know His will when making plans (v. 15). Since James is promoting submission to God's providential guidance in all of one's planning, failure to do so is considered sin. Scripture makes it clear that there are not only sins of commission but also sins of omission (cf. Matt. 25:31–46). Simply knowing the right thing—namely, being conscious of God's sovereignty—but failing to actually incorporate Him into planning is not just foolish or bad; it is sin (James 4:17).

5:1–6. Warning to Landlords. This section begins—as it did in 4:13–17—with the formula of address: age nyn ("come now" or "now listen"; 4:13; 5:1). Both of these sections condemn the pursuit of wealth that fails to recognize the reality of God and His will for humanity. The rich whom James attacks in this section are wealthy landowners (v. 4). The sins for which they are attacked are their selfish hoarded wealth (vv. 2–3), the defrauding of their workers (v. 4), their self-indulgent lifestyle (v. 5), and their oppression of the righteous (v. 6).

The imperative to "weep and howl/wail" is reminiscent of the prophets, who cried out against the judgments of the heathen nations (Is. 15:2–3; Jer. 9:1; 13:17), while the warning in James 5:2–3 resembles Jesus's warning in Matthew 6:19–21 not to collect and store treasures on earth, where they may be destroyed. Even the metals of gold and silver—generally impervious to rust—would not survive the coming judgment (James 5:1, 5, 7). But James may also be playing on words here. The Greek word for "rust" (ios) is homonymous with the word for "poison" (ios), which James uses to describe the tongue (3:8). Just as the tongue is likened to poison and to destructive fire, so too is wealth, since it will eat their flesh like a fire (v. 3).

The specific background to 5:4 is the OT principle of prompt payment of wages (Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:14–15). It appears endemic to human nature for the rich to oppress the poor, and the Greco-Roman world was no exception. James condemns not the simple enjoyment of material blessings but the sybaritic enjoyment of material wealth that has been acquired in an unrighteous manner. The phrase in a "day of slaughter" (James 5:5) may be referring to the moment of the poor being exploited/slaughtered by the rich who have fattened themselves at their expense. The reference could also be to the feast days, when many animals were slaughtered and people ate much meat. But the phrase could also designate (as in the OT) the judgment day (Is. 30:25; 34:2; Jer. 12:3), perhaps suggesting the coming of another day of slaughter against the wicked. In the climax of the denunciation, James accuses the rich of having condemned and murdered the righteous (v. 6) in the sense of depriving them of their livelihood. The withholding of wages from the laborer is tantamount to murder, and the laborer is not in a position to resist (cf. 2:6).

5:7–11. Faith and Patience. This section summarizes the theme of the rich and poor with the call to patient endurance and community harmony. Patient endurance is the appropriate response to testing (1:2–3). Here James gives the eschatological motivation for endurance: the nearness of the coming of the Lord. Christians are to wait until Jesus returns and sets the oppressed free. This hope will require patience. James illustrates the concept of patience using the climate in the Holy Land. The early spring rain provides groundwater for the spring growth, while later, autumn rain secures a good harvest (Deut. 11:14; Jer. 5:24; Joel 2:23–24). The power to exercise patience lies in the conviction of the imminence of the time of judgment (James 5:8).

At first glance, the exhortation to not grumble against one another (v. 9) does not seem to fit in this context; however, grumbling does occur when people are under pressure. James's readers—under the pressure of poverty and persecution (5:1–6)—might vent their frustration on one another (cf. Ex. 2:23; Lev. 19:18). As an example of endurance amidst suffering, James points to the prophets. Although we are not told what specific prophets James had in mind, we may think of those "who spoke in the name of the Lord" (5:10), like Jeremiah, who suffered hardship from his own people or Isaiah, who appears to have died as a martyr by being sawed in two (Heb. 11:37; cf. ST Feb. 17, 1898). One more example of perseverance is added: Job. In the Bible, Job is portrayed as rather impatient as he complains to God about the injustice he is suffering (Job 3). However, the kind of patience James had in mind is not the passive kind but the persevering kind in the face of suffering (James 5:10). It is accompanied by a blessing (5:11). Such was Job's patience. The blessedness, however, is not a subjective emotional feeling but an objective state of favor with God (1:12).

5:12. Oath Rejection. This verse serves as a bridge between the imperatives of patient perseverance (5:7–11) and perseverance in prayer (5:13–18). It contains a negative command not to swear and a positive command to tell the truth. Swearing is necessary only in a society where truth is not revered. Christians should abstain from taking additional oaths to assure the truthfulness of their speech. Their words should be as trustworthy as a signed legal document (see Matt. 5:34–37). The Bible records oaths taken by God Himself (Num. 14:23; Heb. 3:11, 18; 4:3; 6:13, 16; 7:21), and in some cases the swearing of oaths was commanded (Ex. 22:9–11). The OT laws did not prohibit oaths but demanded that a person be true to the oath taken (Lev. 19:12). Some Christians, like the Anabaptists, have taken the statement of James as a prohibition to take oaths in the courtroom. Here, James most probably refers to voluntary oaths taken in addition to the verbal statements already made by a Christian.

5:13–18. Faith and Prayer. The opening question is tied to the reference to the prophets who suffered (v. 10). This suffering or trouble could refer to the suffering of the righteous at the hands of the rich (v. 6), involving economic oppression, or the suffering caused by physical illness. In response to such suffering, Christians are to pray. If believers are cheerful, then let them sing. All three NT occurrences of the verbal form "to sing" imply a song of praise to God (Rom. 15:9; 1 Cor. 14:15; Eph. 5:19).

A third circumstance for praying is sickness (v. 14). The term "sick" (it can also mean "weak," in the sense lacking the full vitality of life) stands in conjunction with the statement that the Lord will raise them up (v. 15) and the word "healed" (v. 16)—pointing to a physical malady. When the verb astheneō ("to be sick") refers to spiritual weakness, it is accompanied by a qualifier (as in "weak" in the faith; Rom. 14:1; or being weak in conscience; 1 Cor. 8:7). James, rather than urging only those who are sick to pray, suggests that they should ask for the elders of the church to pray over them and to anoint them with oil in the name of the Lord (v. 14). The elders were people in the local congregations who were trusted and recognized for their maturity of faith (Acts 11:30; 14:23; 15:2). However, the power to heal is invested in prayer, not in the elders. These verses help us to understand the corporate nature of faith: intercession, confession, and forgiveness to produce health. James's mandate to anoint with oil for healing has some precedents in Jesus's disciples (Mark 6:12–13).

What is the purpose of the anointing? Is it medicinal, sacramental, or symbolic? Oil was used to treat wounds (Luke 10:34), but why should the elders do the anointing if its purpose was solely medical? James tells us that the anointing should be done in the name of the Lord, indicating more than just applying medical unguent. This text, however, offers no support for the sacramental understanding of this procedure, according to which only the priest has the authority to perform the rite. The association of James 5:15 with preparation for death did not develop until the Middle Ages. James recommends anointing in case of any sickness and associates it with the process of healing—not with preparation for death. Anointing in the OT is often associated with consecration to God's service (Ex. 28:41). It could be that the anointing symbolizes a consecration of the sick person to God or the presence of the Spirit of the Lord during the prayer for healing. The prayer "in the name of the Lord" (James 5:14) is reminiscent of Jesus's promise to do anything that is asked in His name (John 14:14).

The prayer mentioned by James needs to be a prayer characterized by trust in God and in His supreme will since, as in Paul's case, the prayer for healing might not be granted even when the prayer is offered multiple times (2 Cor. 12:7–9). What then are we to make of the declaration that the prayer of faith will sōzō the sick (James 5:15)? It is important to recognize that this verb can refer to eschatological salvation (Rom. 5:9–10) or to physical healing (cf. Matt. 9:21–22; Mark 3:4; 5:23, 28, 34; John 11:12). Based on the context, James is discussing physical restoration. The spiritual aspect of healing, however, should not be underestimated; James also assures the person of forgiveness of sins (v. 16).

How is it that healing and forgiveness depend on the faith and prayer of the elders and not on the faith and prayer of the sick person? The answer may lie in the corporate nature of the people of God; when one person suffers the whole body suffers (1 Cor. 12:26). This verse also raises the question of the degree of connection between sickness and sin. The NT seems to recognize such a connection to a certain degree (Mark 2:1–12; 1 Cor. 11:30), yet in discussing the situation of the man born blind in John 9, Jesus urged caution in any specific situation. Not all sickness is the result of a personal sin.

Corporate prayer requires corporate confession so that the healing might be possible (James 5:16). This exhortation implies not a confession of every sin one has committed to fellow believers but an application of the teachings of Jesus in Matthew 5:24 that members should be reconciled with one another. This is particularly the case in sins that involve the body of believers, such as internal conflict (James 4:1), slander ("speaking evil") of someone else (4:11), or complaining about one another (5:9). Corporate confession of corporate sins and prayer for one another heals the church.

While the discussion of faith and patience (5:7–11) ended with the example of Job, this section closes with the example of Elijah (vv. 17–18), who is described as a common human being. The same applies to Paul and Barnabas, who implored the citizens of Lystra to consider them not as gods but as humans just like themselves (Acts 14:15). James clarifies that Elijah prayed not only for the drought to end but also for it to begin and that it lasted three and a half years (taking into consideration that the interval from the previous rain to the drought was six months; cf. Luke 4:25). When Elijah prayed for the rain to return after the showdown on Mount Carmel, his servant had to look out to the sea seven times before the great downpour finally occurred. Likewise, the believer in times of trouble may need to wait and pray patiently before a prayer is answered.

5:19–20
Conclusion

James concludes with an exhortation to refrain from disobedience—not with an epistolary-styled ending. With another direct address to his "brethren" or "brothers and sisters," he places responsibility on the congregation for every erring person, who willfully disobeys and departs from the truth. Whoever helps a person to turn back to God will meet positive consequences. James 5:20 is somewhat ambiguous. Whose soul is saved and whose sin is covered? Is it the repentant, formally erring person or the one who turns him or her back? It is more likely that the soul or person saved and the sins covered is referring to the sinner turned back to God. The one who reclaims the lost is assumed to have already experienced the forgiveness of sins. The covering of sins does not mean that sins are hidden or concealed but signifies forgiving, removing, or eliminating them (cf. Pss. 32:1; 85:2).

If James is something like a sermon in epistolary form, then these last verses are an appropriate conclusion. The reader should not only do the things discussed by James but also be concerned that others do them also. In so doing, their hearts will be established in preparation for the coming of the Lord (5:8). For now, they are to be patient until that time (5:7–8).

1 PETER

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. Among ancient Greek manuscripts, the earliest extant titles given to this epistle date to the third and fourth century and are simply "Epistle of Peter A" and "of Peter A." As with other NT letters, later scribes occasionally expanded the title to make it more descriptive. This resulted in titles like "The (First) Epistle of the Holy Apostle Peter," "The (First) Catholic Epistle of the Holy Apostle Peter," and, in one eleventh-century manuscript, "The First Letter Peter Decreed for the Faithful Jews." The word "catholic," which means "universal," was attached to some titles because the letter is not addressed to any specific church. This is why 1 Peter is also placed in the section of the NT known as the Catholic or General Epistles (the letters of Peter, John, James, and Jude).

The author identifies himself as Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ (1:1), an "elder," and a witness of the sufferings of Christ (5:1). Not only does the account give the impression that the author was, in fact, an eyewitness of Jesus's ministry (2:20–25), but the terminology also resembles some of the words attributed to Peter in Acts (e.g., 1:2, 20; 2:4 and Acts 2:23; 1 Pet. 1:12; 3:22; 4:1 and Acts 2:33; 1 Pet. 1:11; 3:15; 4:12 and Acts 2:36; 1 Pet. 3:22 and Acts 2:38; 1 Pet. 4:5 and Acts 10:42). While early Christians unanimously recognized Peter as the author, some recent scholars have raised objections that the fine quality of the author's Greek could not have been written by someone like Peter, who lacked formal training (Acts 4:13). Additionally, it is claimed that the letter shares far too many similarities to Pauline theology for Peter to have written it. These objections, however, are easily explained, given that Peter used the erudite Silvanus (Silas) as his secretary (1 Pet. 5:12), and that Peter and Paul shared a similar Christ-centered theological outlook (Gal. 1:18; 2:7–9). If Peter were not the author, it would be strange that only his name was attached to this epistle in the ancient manuscripts.

Date. The letter was written before Peter's death, which occurred in Rome during Nero's persecution of Christians. Nero blamed the Christians for a fire that destroyed much of the city in A.D. 64. Since Peter was encouraging Christians to respect the emperor (1 Pet. 2:13, 17), the letter was likely written in the early A.D. 60s, before all the trouble began in Rome (which Peter figuratively refers to as "Babylon"; cf. 5:13; Rev. 14:8; 16:19; 17:5, 9, 18). Early Christian tradition confirms that Peter spent the last years of his life in Rome before he was martyred for his faith.

Backgrounds. Peter wrote at a critical time in the history of the early church. Although the Neronian persecution in Rome (A.D. 64–68) had not yet broken out, trouble was in the air for Christians across the empire. Up until this point, most of the opposition believers faced had been from overzealous Jews who felt threatened by this new faith and was limited in scope. The Roman authorities had more often served to protect than to persecute Christians (e.g., Acts 18:12–16; 21:30–32). The situation was quickly changing, however, as a growing number of Gentiles became followers of Jesus. The decision of these new converts to stop participating in public banquets and ceremonies held in pagan temples (1 Pet. 4:3–4) and to no longer worship the traditional Roman gods not only surprised but concerned their contemporaries. The social equality practiced in the church—that united all believers in Christ regardless of their ethnic background, social class, or gender—also served to further threaten the established social order of the empire (1:18).

Concerned that the departure of these Christian converts from their ancestral ways might anger the gods and result in punitive consequences for their communities, community members often reviled and reproached Christians for their faith (3:9; 4:4, 14) and accused them of being evildoers (4:15). Communities that had once been indifferent were now beginning to notice the growing new faith and to respond violently against it at times (4:1).

Written to believers scattered across Asia Minor (1:1), Peter's letter sought to strengthen the church in the face of opposition and suffering, reminding them that they were standing in the "grace of God" (5:12) and that, though society might reject them, God had chosen them as His special people (2:9–10). If they would remain faithful in the midst of suffering, as Jesus did, they too would be strengthened and vindicated by God in the end (5:10).

Theology and Purpose. The main focus of 1 Peter is on the need for believers to stand in God's grace (5:12)—remaining in the faith received at a time of impending crisis. The crisis in view is the prejudice against Christians that was beginning to unfold and would soon break out in forceful persecution. But also in view is an anticipation of the end, the expected realization of their hope: the notion that the last days were dawning on the world and that the judgment of God would follow. Against this backdrop the following theological concepts stand out:

1. Christians as Pilgrims and Exiles. One of the foundational themes of 1 Peter is the identification of the people of God as foreign pilgrims and exiles (1:1; 2:11)—and not simply that but specifically as parepidēmois diasporas ("pilgrims"/"exiles" of the "Diaspora"). This terminology is significant. The word "Diaspora" comes from the Greek verb diaspeirō, which means "to scatter in every direction." While the term was used to describe any displaced group of people, in Jewish literature it specifically refers to Jews who were forced to live outside of Israel due to the Babylonian conquest of Judea (Jer. 15:7; 41:17, LXX [34:17 Eng.]; cf. Dan. 12:2). On the basis of this terminology, many early commentators assumed that Peter's audience was comprised of Jewish Christians. But Peter was clearly writing to Gentiles who had been redeemed from the hedonistic lifestyle described in 1 Peter 4:3, that is, from the aimless and empty ways (1:18) they had inherited from their ancestors.

In an attempt to help these Gentile converts recognize and embrace their identity as the people of God, Peter's epistle applies terminology associated with Israel to the Christian communities scattered across Asia Minor. He wanted them to know that they were part of God's covenant family. As such, they too were to see themselves as exiles from the true land of promise: heaven. Although in the world, they were called to stand apart as God's chosen people. It is because of this apartness that they were living life by a different set of values and morals than that of society around them—while at the same time being careful not to cause undue offense by their actions (2:12–17). In recognizing their identity as people of God (2:9–10), they would understand why the world often treated them with reproach and contempt (2:12; 3:9, 16; 4:4, 12, 14); they did not truly belong to the communities in which they lived. The reference to "Babylon" at the end of the letter indicates that this concept of God's people as foreign travelers and exiles is the framework in which Peter's entire letter should be understood. As travelers, the Christians were nurtured by the hope of the coming of Christ when the journey was to end.

2. Jesus Christ. Although Peter highlights various aspects of the role of each member of the Godhead in the plan of salvation (1:2, 3, 10–12, 17; 3:18; 4:19), Jesus Christ is the central focus of his theology. Through Jesus, the divine plan established by God the Father before Creation has become a reality (1:20). This salvation was accomplished through Christ's redemptive suffering on the cross (2:24; 3:18), through His resurrection from the dead (1:3, 21; 3:18), and at His ascension, when He declared victory over the demonic powers and took His rightful place at the right hand of God (3:19–20, 22).

There are several distinctive aspects of Peter's theology of Jesus that are also worth noting: Peter identifies Jesus as the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 52:13—53:12. While other NT writers quote from this section of Isaiah (Matt. 8:17; Luke 22:37; John 12:38; Acts 8:32–33; Rom. 10:16; 15:21), no other author interprets the suffering and death of Jesus in connection to the Suffering Servant of Isaiah as fully as Peter does (1 Pet. 1:10–11; 2:21–25; 3:18). It is also only in Peter that we see the beautiful image of the church as a spiritual building founded on Christ, the living cornerstone, and composed of individual Christian believers, who are living stones (2:4–8). It is through the identification of Christ as both the Suffering Servant of Isaiah and the Cornerstone rejected by human builders that Peter set forth the pattern of worldly rejection and divine vindication that is to be the expected pattern of the life of Christians in this world (4:1, 12–14, 19; 5:9–10) as they await His return.

COMMENTARY

1:1–2

Introductory Greeting

The author of the letter identifies himself as Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ. His original Hebrew name was Simon ("answering [prayers]"); Peter was his Greek name. He was born in Bethsaida on the northeastern shore of the Sea of Galilee (John 1:44) and grew up to become a fisherman called by Jesus to be one of His apostles. "Apostle" designates a delegate sent by someone with a message. Peter was the messenger of Jesus, who Himself was the Messiah (or "the Christ" in Greek).

The letter is addressed to the elect ones sojourning in the Diaspora (for more on theology and purpose, see 1 Peter: Introduction)—those who had been scattered to various places outside their homeland (see 1 Pet. 2:11). The specific countries where they were residing as pilgrims or exiles were all located in Asia Minor. God, in His foreknowledge, chose them to be part of His people. This election was effected through the sanctifying power of the Spirit, to which they freely responded through an obedience that was totally dependent on the effectiveness of the cleansing blood of Christ's sacrificial death (see 1:17–20, 22, 23; 2:21–25; 3:18). These Christians were living in the world as pilgrims or foreigners facing prejudice as a result of living according to the values of their heavenly home.

When Peter calls believers "elect" or "chosen" (1:1) and "a chosen generation" or "people" (2:9), he is using language employed elsewhere for Israel (cf. Ex. 19:5–6; Deut. 7:6; Ps. 105:6, 43; Is. 45:4). However, 1 Peter was written primarily for a Gentile Christian audience. How can this be? The universalization of the faith of Israel through Jesus, the Messiah, made salvation available to all. Since many Gentiles chose to believe, they became children of Abraham by faith (Gal. 3:7) and part of the Israel of faith.

Praises for a Great Salvation

After the initial salutation, Peter praises God for the great work of salvation unfolding in the lives of believers. He will discuss the nature of God's saving acts (vv. 3–5), the joy of salvation in

The Israel of Faith

Israel was the name given to Jacob after he wrestled with the angel of the Lord on his way back to his father's home (Gen. 32:28). It means "God prevails/wins" or "he who prevails/wins with God." As such, it designated Jacob's new status that brought him peace and forgiveness. Israel is a name that highlights his spiritual identity.

To be part of Israel, one had to accept the covenant God made with the people on Mount Sinai. Israelites who violated the covenant could be cut off from the people (Lev. 7:20, 21, 25, 27; 18:29; 19:8). Conversely, foreigners who adopted the covenant were incorporated as full members of Israel (Ex. 12:38; Num. 11:4; 13:6; 32:12; Josh. 2:1–22; Ruth 1:16; 2 Sam. 11:10–11). In the time of Solomon, there were 153,600 foreign proselytes in Israel (2 Chr. 2:17). In the second century B.C., the nation of the Idumeans was forcefully converted en masse. The covenant of Israel was therefore an open one to which new members could be added and from which violators could be expelled, much like it happens in a church. Indeed, Stephen calls Israel the ekklēsia ("church") in the wilderness (Acts 7:38)—a term also used repeatedly in the Septuagint (e.g., Deut. 4:10; 9:10; 18:16; 23:2–8; 1 Sam. 17:47; Ps. 21:23, LXX).

This outlook is foundational if we want to understand the concept of Israel in the Bible. Paul declares that the gifts and calling of God are irrevocable (Rom. 11:29). The promises God gave to Abraham and his descendants were going to be fulfilled. How? Paul compares Israel to an olive tree, explaining that some of the branches were broken off because of unbelief (Rom. 11:17, 20). New ones, of Gentile background, were then grafted into that same tree through faith (Rom. 11:19–20). Thus, the once beautiful tree that became tattered because of the broken branches became complete and beautiful again, and thus "all Israel"—that is, the Israel of faith—will be saved (Rom. 11:26).

the midst of trials (vv. 6–9), and the prophetic foundation of salvation through Christ (vv. 10–12). The passage dynamically deals with the past, the present, and the future dimensions of salvation.

1:3–5. Nature of God's Saving Act. Peter provides the fundamental reason to praise "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1:3): He has saved us through Christ. This salvation is firmly grounded in the resurrection of Jesus and is a glorious manifestation of God's limitless or abundant mercy (eleos; "compassion"). This mercy worked within believers, and they were reborn to a new hope, suggesting that apart from divine mercy humanity lacks true hope. This hope is solidly grounded in the resurrection of Jesus. Divine mercy has also provided a heavenly inheritance essentially different from any earthly inheritance (v. 4). It is reserved in heaven for us and is therefore untouched by the corruptibility and defilement of sin. It does not fade away—the passage of time does not damage it. God is preserving it for us. The assurance of this salvation is based on the fact that the power of God, which is operative in us through faith, is able to keep us until the fullness of salvation is manifested in the "last time" (v. 5): at the Second Coming of Christ.

1:6–9. Joy of Salvation and Trials. According to Peter, salvation fills the human heart with joy. He also knew that believers were going through the distress caused by trials and that this may have seemed incompatible with the joy of salvation. The Greek word for "trial" (peirasmos) could also be translated as "temptations," but here it means "trial" or "tests." As Peter was writing, Christianity was coming under pressure from different directions. In the not too distant future, the Christians in Rome would face the fierce persecutions of Nero. Peter returns to the idea of suffering for the sake of faith repeatedly throughout the epistle.

Such pressure understandably causes grief. But more importantly, the trials of believers become a test, revealing the depth and genuineness of their faith. This faith is more valuable than gold, and God will reward it by giving them glory and honor at the glorious return of Jesus (v. 7; cf. Rom. 2:7). Human life is so tainted by our sinful, human nature that it is difficult for us to think about God praising us—especially in the midst of trials. But we should remember that, first, the new birth that Peter speaks about in v. 3 leads to a new life exemplified by qualities that are indeed praiseworthy. Born again believers learn to follow the Lamb wherever He goes (Rev. 14:4). Second, having been ransomed by the Lamb, believers now belong to Him. The praise, honor, and glory Christ receives He shares with them.

Therefore, instead of grieving over trials, believers have reason to rejoice in Christ. Although they have not seen Him, they have believed in Him and love Him (1 Pet. 1:8; cf. John 20:29). This has filled their hearts with inexpressible joy in anticipation of the goal of their faith, namely, the salvation of their souls (v. 9). Their commitment to Christ is based on the grace of God and the prophetic word. Having been an eyewitness to Jesus was no doubt considered a great privilege (e.g., 1 Pet. 5:1; Luke 1:2; 24:48; Acts 1:8, 22; 2:32; 3:15), but the witness of Scripture was an even stronger foundation for faith (2 Pet. 1:19).

1:10–12. Prophetic Foundation of Salvation. The salvation that is a present reality but that in hope looks forward to its consummation was revealed by God to His prophets. When God told them about this future salvation, they searched for its timing and manner (vv. 10–11). The content of this prophetic revelation was the manifestation of the grace of God in the sufferings of Christ, the promised Messiah, and the glories that would follow, that is, His exaltation and the exultation of His people (v. 11). They received this revelation through the Spirit of Christ, who was in them (v. 11), revealing the future work of Christ. The Spirit told them that this glorious saving action would not be fulfilled during their lives but that they were predicting what has happened through Christ—being proclaimed through the power of the Spirit. The mystery of salvation, revealed to the prophets and which angels desire to look into, has been manifested in Christ. The verb translated "look into" (parakyptō) involves stooping to see more clearly, as, for example, when Mary and later the disciples stooped to look into the empty tomb (Luke 24:12; John 20:5, 11). In the case of the angels, who dwell in heaven, the idea is probably looking with amazement at how Christ humbled Himself by becoming human, took the form of a servant, and was willing to die on the cross for the salvation of sinful human beings (Phil. 2:5–11). The whole cosmos seems to be astonished at this glorious manifestation of the saving grace of God.

A Call to Be Holy

Peter is very much interested in the theme of holy living. In the previous section (1:3–12), he briefly described the great gift of salvation God has bestowed on believers—as a result of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus—as a past, historical event. This salvation has filled their lives with love and hope in the present and looks forward to the return of Jesus. Salvation through Christ is the foundation for a holy life. In this section, Peter sets the tone by calling believers to live a holy life (1:13–16), by motivating them (vv. 17–21), and by challenging them to live up to what they are supposed to be in Christ (1:17—2:3). God's work of salvation through Jesus has set His people apart from the world and calls them to live as foreigners.

1:13–16. Holy Calling. "Therefore" implies that what follows is based on what was said before. Because of what God has done, believers are now also asked to do, or rather be, holy (v. 16). Believers need to anazōsamenoi tas osphyas their minds (v. 13). This phrase, translated as "minds that are alert" or "prepare your minds for action," is also rendered in a literal sense as "gird up the loins of your mind." Ancient Jews usually wore long, flowing garments. When they had to work in a field or workshop, they would fold the garment upward and tie it at the waist so that it became like a pair of short trousers. This would give them greater freedom to act efficiently. To "gird up the loins" in a spiritual sense would mean to be ready for focused, deliberate Christian living in pursuit of holiness. "Holy" is that which is set apart for a special purpose. Holiness therefore implies both a separation from former things and an attachment to the things of God. With regard to the former, believers should no longer conform to former lusts or "desires" (epithymia; v. 14). This Greek word may refer to sexual immorality (e.g., Rom. 1:24) but can also describe other types of desire, be they noble (e.g., Luke 22:15) or inappropriate (e.g., Mark 4:19). Here, the word obviously has negative connotations and refers not only to sexual lust but to all kinds of sinful desires that spring from a carnal mind (cf. Rom. 6:12). The separation from a former life controlled by sinful desires should lead to a desire to be holy, as God is. To add force to this concept, Peter quotes the Scriptures where the Lord calls His people to "be holy" because He is holy (1 Pet. 1:16; Lev. 11:44, 45; 20:7, 26).

1:17–21. Motivation for Holy Living. A holy life consists of acting according to the fear of the Lord, knowing that He whom we call the Father is an impartial Judge who judges all according to their works. "Fear" means living a life of reverent submission to God. Peter goes on to indicate that God is not only the Judge but also the Redeemer. Believers have been redeemed from their previous aimless and empty lives through the sacrificial death of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect. He took their place as a sacrificial victim in order for them to be without blemish or spot. What Jesus did was what the Godhead foreordained before the creation of the cosmos, and that has now been revealed to those who have placed their faith in Him. The plan of salvation was formulated by God long before Creation. It included not only His incarnation, death, and resurrection but also His glorification. It is the realization of how great a price God paid for our redemption—the precious blood of Christ—that motivates us to live holy lives.

1:22—2:3. Become What You Are. Peter exhorts believers to be what they are: they are already holy by obeying the truth—the gospel of salvation—with its ethical ramifications. The Spirit had placed in their hearts sincere love for each other as brothers and sisters. This is what they had already experienced. Now it was their duty to love one another earnestly from a pure heart (v. 22). The love they had should flow out from a holy heart and touch others. Peter knew that what he was describing is not a natural response of the human heart but the result of a new birth produced by the word of God, which is an incorruptible seed that abides forever (v. 23). What is earthly—the grass, human glory, and the flowers—fades away, but not God's word. The implication is that a holy life, made possible through God's word, is destined for eternity. This powerful word reached the believers through the gospel and transformed their lives. Therefore, they had to lay aside (apotithēmi; "abandon," "remove something," "get rid of") all kakia ("malice," "wickedness," "ill-will"), dolos ("deceit," "guile," treachery"), hypokrisis ("hypocrisy," "pretense," "playing a part"), phthonos ("envy," "jealousy"), and katalalia ("evil speaking," "defamation," "slander") (2:1). Peter offers the positive side of the picture using the image of a newborn (see 1:23) who is to be fed with the milk of the word of God that will facilitate spiritual growth in grace. This is based on the recognition that we have experienced the goodness of God through Christ as described in 1:18–21.

2:4–12

A Spiritual Temple

From the image of church members as babies, Peter turns to the image of the church as a temple and believers as stones. He discusses the image of living stones (vv. 4–6), explains the significance of the imagery (vv. 7–10), and moves to the image of exiled pilgrims (vv. 11–12). The key point of the image of the temple is that Christ is the cornerstone on which we are being built. Rejecting Christ is like stumbling on a stone and falling.

2:4–6. Precious Stone in the Temple. Believers come to the Lord, mentioned in the previous verse, as a living stone. Jesus is compared to a stone that is alive. People had rejected Him as a valuable stone for the construction of their lives, but He had been chosen by God as a very precious and valuable stone. This cornerstone (akrogōniaios; "cornerstone" or "capstone") is the one on which believers are to build their lives as a spiritual temple (v. 6). Believers are temples and at the same time a holy priesthood (v. 5) to offer spiritual sacrifices that are acceptable to God because they are offered through the work of Jesus as High Priest. A holy life is one dedicated to God, as the sacrifices were. Building on Jesus is the same as believing in Him (v. 6).

2:7–10. Interpreting the Image of the Temple. Peter proceeds to explain the image of the temple. Those who believe in Jesus are those who realize that He is indeed precious and of great value. Those who reject Him as a precious stone are rebellious and disobedient; He has become a stumbling stone to them on their way to acceptance before God. They did not listen to the word through which they could have been reborn (1:23). The stone is also identified with the word—Jesus's message of salvation. The reference to the fate of those who stumble as being destined or appointed (2:8) is not teaching predestination to condemnation. What God has established is that disobedience, which presupposes the use of free will, results in stumbling.

Believers were chosen by God to become His people: a royal priesthood, a holy nation, His own special possession. Previously Peter talked about a "holy priesthood," but now he speaks about a "holy nation." Both expressions refer to the high status of believers as God's people. The emphasis on holiness continues. The purpose of their election is that they proclaim the praises of the One who called them out of darkness into His wondrous light. People, by nature, exist in darkness, and the possibility of light is a reality only in God. This means that, originally, Gentiles were not part of the people of God. But now they have received divine mercy and are included. They did not stumble over the Living Stone.

2:11–12. Believers as Sojourners. If believers belong to the people of God, they have become sojourners or foreign exiles in this world. Peter exhorts them to live as such. He first exhorts them to abstain from sarkikōn epithymiōn ("fleshly lusts," "sinful desires," "worldly desires"; 2:11; see 1:14). Such behavior does not characterize those who are people of God. Peter here echoes sentiments expressed by Paul in Romans 7:7—8:2. Paul wanted to live in harmony with God's good and holy law (Rom. 7:12, 21), but the power of sin and death dwelling within him was pulling him in the opposite direction (7:14, 15, 18–20). Paul realized that only in Christ can the believer withstand and gain mastery over these sinful desires (Rom. 7:25—8:4).

Second, Peter exhorts believers to live with good, honorable conduct among the pagan Gentiles (1 Pet. 2:12). Given the mounting social pressure on the young church, Peter hoped that honorable conduct would serve to dampen the negative feelings of the Gentiles. More important, however, was the hope that in seeing the good lives and works of Christians, some would turn from being persecutors to being believers. This is what Peter had in mind with his hope that they may glorify God on the day of episkopē ("visit," "overseeing"; v. 12). This day is the day of judgment. The holy life of a Christian could obviously have a positive impact on society.

2:13—3:12

In the World but Not of the World

Peter next provides specific instructions to different groups within the church on how to live a holy life as they relate to others. He began with the secular authorities (2:13–17); then the relationship between servants and masters (vv. 18–25); then wives and husbands (3:1–7); and finally, gave general admonitions for the church (vv. 8–12).

2:13–17. Secular Authorities. Peter encouraged believers to be submissive to the king or emperor (v. 13) or to local governors (v. 14) because it is God's will (v. 15; cf. Rom. 13:1; Titus 3:1). The advice may sound strange. The Roman Empire would eventually launch severe persecutions, putting heavy pressure on Christians to abandon their faith in Jesus Christ or face imprisonment and even death. Were believers to submit to such authorities? We need to keep two things in mind. First, obedience to secular authorities is required only insofar as it does not violate our duty to God. Peter seems to intimate as much when he says that believers should submit to authorities for the Lord's sake (2:13). Clearly, the "for the Lord's sake" is the guiding motivation, and it primarily refers to submission in order to honor the Lord and not to shame Him in the eyes of unbelievers. Implicit is the idea that if secular authorities were to require believers to act in ways that violated God's will for them, they should not submit to them. Paul gave similar advice when he stated that Christians should live peaceably with everyone, adding the caveat "if" or to the degree that it is possible (Rom. 12:18).

Second, up to the time of Peter the Roman authorities had not yet persecuted Christians but had at times intervened to protect them (see 1 Peter: Introduction). The growth of Christianity was beginning to be noticed, however, and antagonism was developing against Christians; in some cases, they were subject to physical violence (1 Pet. 4:1). Although unknown to Peter at the time, it would also not be long before the Emperor Nero would capitalize on the growing ill will expressed toward Christians and blame them for starting the great fire that left seventy percent of Rome in smoldering ruins. By showing themselves to be good citizens and by honoring all persons (2:17), believers could debunk some of the hatred beginning to grow against them and perhaps postpone or dampen the impact of the more widespread persecutions that were to follow.

2:18–25. Servants to Masters. Peter's advice to servants to be submissive to their masters—both the good ones and the harsh ones—with phobō ("fear," "respect," or "reverence" if God is the referent—in the sense of allowing reverence for God to inform the conduct of the slaves; v. 18) is somewhat perplexing. Peter was not endorsing slavery in any form or shape. He did not justify slavery or the fact that economic circumstances or war had made some masters over others. On the contrary, he indirectly condemns slavery by drawing a parallel between Jesus and servants. The sufferings of Jesus were unjustifiable; He never did anything wrong (v. 22). By implication, a servant who behaves respectfully but still suffers wrongly is walking in the steps of Jesus. The Lord is on the servant's side, not the master's.

The experience of Jesus should function as a model for servants. When mistreated and abused He did not attack His abusers but placed the matter in the hands of the divine Judge. As the Servant of the Lord, He "bore our sins" in His own body on the cross (v. 24) and died for us (see Is. 53). To "bear sin" means to assume responsibility for it by receiving its penalty. This Jesus did by dying on the tree (the cross). He received what was ours in order for us to receive what was His. His stripes/wounds, which were to be ours on account of our sins, brought us healing/salvation. He died in our place in order for us to live for righteousness—to live in a new way (Rom. 6:3–4). Based on Isaiah 53:5–6, Peter referred to his audience as sheep having gone astray but now under the care of Jesus, the Shepherd and Overseer of their souls (see 1 Pet. 2:25). He is the unmatched leader of the church as Shepherd and Overseer, constantly caring for it. As such, He cares in a particular way for the slaves suffering under the oppression of their masters. But their sufferings could bring about something good for them and others, as Jesus's did (cf. Rom. 8:28).

If Christian servants had been involved in acts of disobedience or even rebellion against their pagan masters, Christianity would have been considered a subversive and dangerous religion. Rome had already experienced substantial slave unrest in the rebellion of Spartacus and did not take kindly to any signs of sedition. Peter's advice aimed at protecting both servants and believers in general from being perceived as opposed to the order of the empire. In the corrupt context of the first century Roman Empire, the best way for Christians to impact their world would be to follow the example of Jesus, the Servant of all servants.

3:1–6. Wives to Husbands. Peter next deals with the relationship of wives and husbands, and admonishes wives to be submissive, even if the husband is not a believer (v. 1). This and similar verses in Paul (Eph. 5:24; Col. 3:18; Titus 2:5; cf. 1 Cor. 14:34) have been wrongly used to suggest that wives are less than equal in the marriage relationship. The Greek verb translated "submissive" (hypotassō) is a passive participle, indicating that the submission is done voluntarily and is not to be imposed by force by the husband. Jesus willingly submitted to His parents (Luke 2:51); believers should be submissive to the leaders in the local church (1 Cor. 16:15–16) and to one another (1 Pet. 5:5; Eph. 5:21); and the church submits to Christ (Eph. 5:24). In these examples, submission is not forced but is offered voluntarily. Moreover, while in the case of Christ and the church there is an element of clear primacy of one party—Christ, over the church—in all other cases it is a question of relationships between equals. The advice of Peter, therefore, does not indicate the superiority of one spouse over the other.

It is also important to note that the advice is focused primarily on wives who became Christians while their husbands remained pagans (1 Pet. 3:1). In Roman society wives were accorded few rights by law and husbands had almost absolute authority over them. If the Christian wife were to claim independence in any form, it would bring disrepute to the Christian faith and troubles for the wife. Their submissiveness was to be motivated not by societal expectations but in the fear of the Lord (cf. 1:17; 2:17; 3:2), that is, out of reverence to God. This advice, in accordance with the earlier admonitions of duty to government and masters, was to bring change through a kind and humble spirit.

In 3:3–4, Peter encourages wives to cultivate inward beauty as opposed to focusing on their outward adornment. This sort of warning was not uncommon during Peter's day. Pagan authors often criticized the extreme hairstyles of wealthy women and the ostentatious ornamentation that emphasized their high status in society. Peter's primary concern is to emphasize that what ultimately matters in the sight of God is a godly character (v. 4). Rather than following the fashions of the day, Christian women should develop an inward beauty based on the Scriptures and on God's will (see 1 Tim. 2:8–10; see below, "Christian Adornment"). He mentions the example of Sarah, who called Abraham "lord" or "master" (1 Pet. 3:5–6), thus honoring him before his noble guests (Gen. 18:12).

3:7. Husbands to Wives. In contrast to Peter's lengthy advice to wives, his words to husbands are few but powerful (v. 7). A husband is to live together with his wife with understanding (lit., "according to knowledge," also translated as "be considerate" or "understanding"), which probably means according to the knowledge of God and not according to cultural practices. What rules the relationship of the husband to the wife is the will of God. This includes the command to the husband to honor and respect his wife—that is, not to do or say anything that would shame her. Three reasons are given for this: First, she is to be honored because she is considered a "weaker" partner (or lit., "vessel," implying that the husband is also a vessel). The Greek asthenēs can refer to either physical or emotional lack of strength. It could also designate the lower social status of women in the Roman world. What exactly Peter had in mind is hard to gauge, but the bottom line is that the husband, being in a physical or social position of strength should not humiliate his wife but honor her.

The second reason given for honoring the wife is that she is an equal recipient of the gift of God's grace: the grace that is life (3:7). Peter is not saying that if it were not for grace the wife would have a lower status. Rather, against a backdrop of male dominance in Roman culture, the fact that Jesus treated all people equally—and that women were equal in receiving the gift of salvation—indicates that in God's eyes they are equal to men and should be treated with honor and respect.

The third reason to honor the wife is that God will not listen to the prayers of the husband if he does not treat her as specified here. John 9:31 declares that God does not listen to sinners. Those who knowingly and continually choose to disregard God's will may discover God's unwillingness to answer their prayers. The fact that Peter ties respect for the wife with God lending a listening ear to the husband's prayers indicates

Christian Adornment

Peter's instruction on adornment was taught and promoted by the early church for the first three or four centuries. Then it was abandoned to be reinstated by the more radical Reformers. Adventists consider it to be one of the norms of the Christian life. Therefore, it may be useful to take a closer look at what Peter is saying.

1. Contextual Elements. Peter was interested in the demeanor of Christian women. He indicates that they should be submissive to their husband and live a pure life based on the fear of the Lord, that is to say, in reverential trust in Him. The purpose of this submission is to win their husbands to the Lord. The implication is that such a life is their winsome, spiritual adornment. This leads Peter to discuss the nature of this type of adornment a little more. He does this by contrasting external and internal adornment.

2. External Adornment. Peter mentions three specific examples: arranging the hair, wearing gold adornments, and wearing fine apparel. He is referring to a particular type of hairdo that involved raising the hair up with wires, hanging different types of jewelry on it, and braiding the hair with threads of gold or silver. Wearing gold probably refers to adornments in the form of necklaces, earrings, or rings. Fine clothing designates expensive and ostentatious dresses, implying that although clothing (in contrast to jewelry) is needed, certain types of it are incompatible with the Christian life. Peter calls this adornment outward; it does not really add value to the person.

3. True Adornment. Against the specific outward adornment that Peter is rejecting, he identifies the adornment that is pleasing to God. It is an inner beauty consisting of "a gentle and quiet spirit," which is precious in God's sight (3:4). The ultimate criterion for proper adornment is that which is precious in God's sight. A gentle spirit is based on trust in the Lord (Matt. 5:5; cf. 11:29). A quiet spirit refers to a disposition of tranquility and peacefulness that results from being at peace with God. Its absence generates personal and social turmoil. Peter indicates that the type of external adornment he is discussing is not an expression of submission and dependence on the Lord. When contrasted with a "quiet spirit," such adornment becomes an expression of a restless attitude, a symbol of a need, or even a quest for inner peace that should have been fully met through the gospel. Hence, this adornment is incompatible with the fruits of the Christian message.

4. Nature of the Instruction. The translation "Do not let your adornment be merely outward," adopted by some versions, suggests that the use of jewelry is not strictly forbidden, but that it is not the most important type of adornment for the Christian woman. The adverb "merely" is not in the original Greek text. The problem is that in Greek we have a third person imperative that does not exist in English (we have only a second person imperative). Some translators use what is called an imperative of permission: "Let not your adornment be. . . ." But the Greek third person imperative has the same imperatival force as the second person. What we have here is a negative command followed by, or contrasted by, a positive one. This type of construction is introduced by a negative adverb ("not") and it closes with a contrastive particle ("but" or "rather"). This is what we have in Greek: "Let not their adornment be [third person imperative] the outward consisting of . . . but that of your inner self. . . ."

In other places in the NT, the Greek allows for a translation of this construction as "not so much [this] . . . as [this]," implying that the first part of the sentence is not totally negated (e.g., Mark 9:37). This would mean, in our text, that using jewelry is not necessarily prohibited. But the same construction can be also translated "not [this] . . . but [this]," totally rejecting the first element (Matt. 5:17). The question is which of these two possibilities applies to 1 Peter 3:3–4. When in the NT the construction "Not [this] . . ." is denying a phrase in the imperative, as is the case in our passage ("Do not adorn . . .), the following "but [this]" introduces the contrasting subject and means "but on the contrary." That is to say, the first element ("Let not their adornment be . . .") is negated. In that case, Peter would be forbidding the use of jewelry for personal adornment and probably as a mark of social standing (see Is. 3:19–23). Peter wanted to make clear that the adornment that should matter most to the Christian is the development of a godly character.

5. The Foundation of Peter's Command. Peter is not merely promoting the values he found in Greco-Roman society. His source is the OT. He refers to the experience of the holy women in the Scriptures (1 Pet. 3:5–6). The implication seems to be that part of their adornment consisted in showing honor/respect to their husbands. Peter also grounds his command in God's will for His people—in what is precious and worthy in God's sight (v. 4). True Christian adornment is an expression of Christian virtues and not a display of elaborate hairstyles, gold jewelry, or fine clothing.

that he considered the respectful treatment of the wife a subject of utmost importance.

3:8–12. General Admonitions. Peter next addressed the church members in general and called them to be united in homophrones ("of one mind," "like-minded," "harmonious"; see Phil. 2:2), which he explains to mean to be sympatheis ("sympathetic," "suffer with," "compassionate"), to have philadelphos (mutual love) among believers, to be eusplanchnos ("tenderhearted," "compassionate," caring tenderly for others), to be tapeinophrōn ("courteous," "showing humility" to each other; 1 Pet. 3:8), and to not be vindictive but to bless others as they are and will continue to be blessed by the Lord (cf. Matt. 5:44; Luke 6:28).

Such an attitude is not only a Christian imperative (1 Pet. 3:9; all Christians have been called to it); it is also a sure way to receive the blessings of God and to learn to enjoy a good life (v. 10). This works in two ways. First, those who fill their lives with bad feelings, attitudes, and words for wrongs suffered will ultimately hurt themselves. Such things destroy the Christian peace. More importantly, the attention of the Lord is on the righteous. While responding to evil with evil may give a corrupted sense of justice, it brings the displeasure of God. By contrast, a person who responds to evil by doing good follows in the footsteps of Jesus, is counted righteous, and will receive a due reward.

3:13—4:11

Suffering and Vindication

The conceptual thread that runs throughout this passage is suffering. The audience of Peter was soon to suffer even more because of their faith. How should they behave in the context of persecution? Rather than being discouraged, Peter invited them to be courageous because Christ also suffered. They should be ready to suffer for doing what was good (3:13–17), understanding that they would be vindicated (vv. 18–22) and noting the connection between suffering and holiness (4:1–6). This section concludes with a passage dealing with life within the church (vv. 7–11). The passage logically follows the previous call to reject vindictiveness.

3:13–17. Suffering for Doing Good. Peter's audience was suffering on account of their faith. This opposition had not yet taken the form of violent persecution, but it appears to have been primarily in the form of prejudice against the Christian faith. Peter declares that it is better to suffer for doing good rather than for doing evil, because the first is deserved and the second will be rewarded. Early Christians were accused of a number of things, including immorality (they professed love for each other), disrespect for deities (they rejected the many gods honored by Greeks and Romans), antisocial behavior (they did not participate in civic festivals usually held in honor of pagan gods), anti-family behavior (new Christians were often rejected by their families), introducing a new religion (Romans loved their traditions), and, by some, even of cannibalism (a misunderstanding of the nature of the elements in the Lord's Supper). Such accusations stemmed from ignorance, malice, or both. Peter therefore declares that believers should always be ready to give a reason for their hope with praytētos kai phobou ("gentleness and respect" or "meekness and fear"; vv. 15–16). When the accusations were shown to be baseless, the accusers would be put to shame (v. 16).

3:18–22. Suffering and Vindication. Peter presents Jesus as the most powerful example of the suffering of the innocent. It was through His death and resurrection that He triumphed over the forces of evil and then sat at the right hand of God. His suffering was vicarious in that He, the Just One, suffered for the unjust in order to give us access to God. He was put to death by human instrumentalities but was resurrected by God through the Spirit (see "The Spirits in Prison," p. 1885) and as resurrected Lord, proclaimed to the evil powers His victory over them. These evil powers had shown their disobedient and rebellious spirit during the time of Noah.

The experience of Noah is described as a baptism. While the water destroyed the wicked, Noah and his family passed safely through it inside the ark. The experience of Noah is used as a type of Christian baptism, the antitype. Christians are also saved through the waters of baptism—its effectiveness is determined by the resurrection of Jesus. Baptism is not for the cleansing of the body, but it is rather the expression of a deep spiritual cleansing of the inner being. The answer of a good (clear) conscience toward God indicates that baptism is a commitment to preserve that good conscience through obedience to God or that the forgiveness of sin that restores a good conscience in us is accepted (cf. 2:19; 3:16). The threatening experience of Noah resulted in salvation for him and his family, while the deadly experience of Jesus resulted in salvation for believers. Peter concludes by indicating that the sufferings of Christ resulted not only in His victory over evil powers but also in His enthronement at the right hand of God. All powers are now subject to Him. The implication is that those who suffer oppression in the service of the Lord will also be victorious over their enemies.

4:1–6. Suffering and Holiness. The prejudice and accusations believers were facing might have tempted some to give up their faith. But after Peter explains that it was through His suffering that Jesus attained complete victory, he proceeds to challenge believers to holy living by arming themselves with the same ennoia ("purpose," "attitude," "mind," "way of thinking") that Jesus had (v. 1). They should consider themselves dead to their sinful life because Jesus also suffered and finally died in their place. Trials could encourage them to come closer to the Lord

The Spirits in Prison

First Peter 3:18–20 is one of the most difficult passages in the Bible and has been interpreted in many different ways. The main problem is establishing the identity of the "spirits in prison." We will discuss and evaluate four suggestions.

1. Disembodied Spirits. The most popular suggestion is that the "spirits" in prison were disembodied souls or spirits. It is suggested that when Jesus died, He visited them in hell—also in disembodied form—and preached the gospel to them, since they had died without ever hearing it. This interpretation is untenable both theologically and exegetically. Theologically, according to the Bible humans do not possess an immortal soul and consequently when they die they are totally dead (Eccl. 9:5). They cannot communicate with the living, with each other, or with God (Ps. 6:5; Eccl. 9:6). After death, there is no opportunity for repentance (Heb. 9:27).

Exegetically, the phrase being "put to death in the flesh [or body] but made alive by [or in] the Spirit" (1 Pet. 3:18) is thought to indicate that even though Jesus died physically on the cross, His spirit was still alive and visited the spirits in prison. The Greek literally reads, "put to death by/in flesh, made alive by/in spirit." The Greek participle translated "made alive" is masculine. By contrast, "spirit" (pneuma) in Greek is neuter, while "soul" (psychē) is feminine. So, "made alive" cannot refer to the alleged disembodied spirit or soul of Jesus. It refers to Jesus as a whole: as an indivisible being. Moreover, the idea of "making alive" suggests that the person being made alive was dead. It shows that Jesus had been dead, the very opposite of the view promoted in this interpretation.

The whole phrase is a reference to the death and resurrection of Jesus as a person, not to any supposed constituent part of His being. The phrases "in the flesh" and "in the spirit" indicate agency and should be translated "who was put to death by flesh" (i.e., humans; 1:24) but was "made alive by the Spirit." Jesus was not a disembodied spirit and did not visit disembodied beings.

2. Watchers. A second suggestion is that the spirits in prison were the Watchers, a group of two hundred fallen angels who, according to Jewish tradition, took human wives before the Flood. It is suggested that their offspring were the giants who led the world astray and precipitated the Flood. The whole myth—probably influenced by Greek mythology—is based on a misinterpretation of Genesis 6:1–4. According to this interpretation, the "sons of God" were the angelic Watchers. Jesus supposedly visited them either before or after His resurrection and announced their doom to them.

This is based in two main arguments. First, the Watcher myth was very popular in first-century Judaism, so Peter would have been aware of it. Second, in 1 Peter 3:20 the spirits in prison are directly connected to the Flood, just like in the Jewish myth. We will argue that this approach is not defensible. First, the phrase "sons of God" used in Genesis 6:2, often designates righteous people (e.g., Deut. 14:1; Matt. 5:9; Luke 20:36; Rom. 8:14). Second, angels do not marry (see Matt. 22:30; Mark 12:25). Third, the Jewish tradition of the Watchers is not found in the Bible.

3. Sinful Humans. A third suggestion is that the spirits in prison were the sinful humans in Noah's time. This theory suggests that when Noah proclaimed the coming Flood, it was not just Noah speaking but rather the preincarnate Jesus, who, through the Holy Spirit, inspired Noah. After mentioning the death and resurrection of Jesus in 3:18, Peter looks back to the generation of the Flood and asserts that Jesus was active back then. This view makes much more sense than the previous two but still has a few problems. First, while the word "spirits" may refer to humans (e.g., 1 Cor. 2:11; cf. 1 Cor. 15:45), it is not the common way to do so. Second, while phylakē ("prison") may refer metaphorically to spiritual bonds of sin (see Ps. 141:8, LXX [Eng. 142:7]), it is not a common usage. Third, while it is not impossible to assume that immediately after mentioning the resurrection Peter would look back to the Flood in 3:19, it is more natural to assume that 3:19 follows 3:18 chronologically, in which case the preaching to the spirits took place after the resurrection. Nevertheless, this interpretation remains a viable possibility.

4. Fallen Angels. The fourth suggestion is probably the best way to interpret the imprisoned spirits: to identify them as fallen angels. This suggestion looks to the use of the original language. Hebrews 1:14 calls angels "ministering spirits," while the phrases "impure" or "evil" spirits are used repeatedly for fallen angels (e.g., Mark 3:11; 5:13; Acts 8:7). Moreover, the noun phylakē ("prison") is used forty-seven times in the NT—mostly in a literal sense. But in Revelation 18:2 and 20:7, phylakē is specifically used in relation to Satan and his angels, while 2 Peter 2:4 and Jude 6 describe their imprisonment. The prison of the fallen angels might not have bars and gates, but it is biblically accurate to say that fallen angels are imprisoned—their freedom of movement is curtailed by God.

Although the Greek verb ekēryxen ("preached") is usually employed in relation to the preaching of the gospel, it can simply mean "to proclaim," or "to announce" (e.g., Rev. 5:20; cf. Gen. 41:43; Ex. 32:5; 2 Chr. 20:3). In light of this evidence, we can suggest that 1 Peter 3:18 declares that Jesus was put to death by humans but was resurrected by the Holy Spirit. In 3:19, it is explained that after the resurrection Jesus announced to the spirits in prison (Satan and his angels) their defeat and impending doom (cf. 3:22; Col. 2:15). It is in part because of this proclamation that Satan, knowing that he has only a little time left (Rev. 12:12), is going around like a "roaring lion" seeking to devour (1 Pet. 5:8).

This suggested interpretation is supported by a rarely noticed parallel between 1 Peter 3:19 and 3:22, missed in English translations but clear in the Greek. In 3:19 Jesus "went" to the spirits in prison, but in 3:22 He "has gone into heaven" and is at God's right hand. It seems, therefore, that after the resurrection Jesus did two things: (1) He went to the fallen angels to announce their defeat and doom; and (2) He went to heaven to sit at the right side of the Father. The two are related. His victory over the forces of evil led to His enthronement as King at the side of the Father.

This interpretation faces one difficulty. According to 3:20, the spirits in prison were disobedient while God waited patiently in the days of Noah while the ark was being built. In what sense were the fallen angels "disobedient" when the ark was being prepared? Perhaps the text is simply indicating that the period leading up to the Flood was a time of intense demonic opposition to God's plan for humanity.

and to set aside a life of sin. The contrast is between a life of sin and a life of submission to the will of God. Holy living includes leaving behind the desires of the flesh. Peter mentions some of the prevalent fleshly desires to which believers had probably once been enslaved before coming to faith: aselgeia ("lewdness," "debauchery," "sensuality," "liscentiousness"; behavior that violates social, spiritual, and moral values), epithymia ("lusts," "passions," "[evil] desires"; the unsanctified cravings of the human nature), oinophlygia ("drunkenness," "excess of wine"; absence of alertness and watchfulness; 1:13; 4:7; 5:8), kōmos ("revelries," "orgies," "carousing"; participating in pagan religious feasts), potos ("drinking parties," "wild parties"), and athemitos eidōlolatria ("forbidden," "disgusting," "detestable" idolatries; 4:3; cf. 2:1). Peter describes such a lifestyle as asōtia ("wild living," "dissipation," "debauchery"; 4:4), or a disorderly life.

The last two verses of this section (vv. 5–6) conclude Peter's call to perseverance in suffering by pointing to the final judgment, when God will bring all people, the dead and the living, to account. The clear implication is that God does not judge humans when they die but rather in the final judgment. Peter declares that God is ready to judge (v. 5), expressing God's eager anticipation to judge in order to consummate the redemption of His people and to put an end to sin in all its manifestations. On v. 6, see below, "The Gospel Preached to the Dead."

4:7–11. Life in the Community of Faith. This passage is primarily a conclusion of 2:13–4:6 and concentrates on the Christian life within the community of believers. The situation faced outside the church is difficult, but inside the church it should be different. Peter introduces this passage by saying that the end of all things is near. In the previous verses he wrote about the final judgment; now he exhorts his audience to live in constant expectation of the return of Christ, giving them specific instructions to that end.

The Gospel Preached to the Dead

In the discussion of 1 Peter 4:6, two key questions stand out: Who are the dead to whom the gospel was preached, and to what does "live according to God in the spirit" refer?

1. Suggested Solutions. First Peter 4:6 is often tied to 3:18–20, so that the interpretation of one passage determines the interpretation of the other. Those who believe that Jesus preached to disembodied spirits between His death and resurrection contend that the dead in 4:6 refers to those same disembodied spirits. As indicated in the commentary on 3:18–22, that interpretation is untenable not only theologically but also exegetically. Therefore, the interpretation that the dead in 4:6 refers to disembodied spirits is not a viable option. Those who believed that the spirits in prison of 3:18–20 were the generation of Noah have contended that the dead mentioned in 4:6 heard the gospel while they were alive. While this interpretation makes better sense if these two passages are connected, it does not explain how the generation of Noah heeded the gospel or how they were judged according to men. Only Noah and his family heeded the message. It is highly unlikely that when Peter talks about preaching the gospel to the "dead" his reference is to Noah and his family. Some have concluded that this passage refers to those who are spiritually dead but who had once accepted the gospel of salvation. However, according 4:5, Peter refers to God judging those who are physically dead in the final judgment. There are no contextual indicators of Peter moving from a literal to a figurative view.

2. Important Phrases. Several important phrases used in this passage deserve some attention. The references to the body/flesh and the spirit do not mean in a physical body versus a disembodied existence. Theologically, the biblical view of death is not dualistic (body and soul/spirit as separate entities) but monistic; the human being is one complete, indivisible whole (Gen. 2:7). The phrase translated as "in the flesh," or "in regard to the body," as noted in the discussion on 1 Peter 3:18–20, may also be translated "by flesh" or "by humans." As such, we can translate the whole phrase thus: "That they might be judged by humans according to men [i.e., according to human standards]."

The last clause in 4:6 reads, "but live according to God" in the spirit. The verb "live," though in the present tense, is in the subjunctive mood and therefore indicates a future goal or aim. Given that 4:5 and 4:7 both refer to the final judgment, the future life in view is the life to be received at the resurrection. While unbelievers may consider Christian faith as futile and malign it, Peter foretold God judging believers according to His righteous standard, acquitting them because of the sacrifice of Jesus and giving them the gift of eternal life. Finally, the words translated as "in the spirit" or "in regard to the spirit" may be translated as "by the Spirit," referring to the life to be received at the resurrection. Believers will participate in the experience of Jesus (3:18; Rom. 8:11).

3. Contextual Interpretation. Perhaps the key for the interpretation of 1 Peter 4:6 is to note that the gospel was not preached (a past action) to people who were dead. It was preached to people who were alive when they heard the gospel but had since died. Who are these people? The best contextual answer is that they are Christians who, when Peter was writing, were dead. These had been evangelized and had accepted the gospel of salvation (cf. 1:12, 25) but were now deceased. While they were alive they had been judged or evaluated by human standards (i.e., humans found fault with their Christian behavior, as they were still doing to Peter's audience). This judgment was in the past. In Greek the phrase "that they might be judged" is referring to a past action ("although they were judged"). Peter was telling the church that they should not despair in the face of rejection and oppression, because at the end the true universal Judge would grant them the gift of life.

First, the spiritual life is to be characterized by constant prayer. But when praying, they are to have alertness of mind and integrity. The verb sōphroneō refers to having self-control and a sound mind (translated variously as "alert" or "serious"); it refers to a life characterized by thoughtful self-control. Nēphō ("to be sober"; also translated as "watchful," "clearheaded," or "disciplined") means to be in a state of alertness, free from confusion or mental drunkenness. Prayer is not a mystical exercise but the expression of a life of self-control and clarity of mind.

Second, Peter introduces the most important Christian virtue: love. He calls Christians to earnestly and constantly love each other. His reference to love covering a multitude of sins (Prov. 10:12) identifies a major aspect of love; it is always willing to forgive.

Third, Peter tells believers to be hospitable to one another, particularly to those who travel, gladly, without grumbling or complaining. Peter's admonition to be hospitable is timeless. While in many places pastors and evangelists rarely need the home of believers, hospitality can take many forms. Hospitality is the principle behind taking care of the needy and making people feel welcome in the fellowship of faith. Love and hospitality combined serve as the glue that keeps the family of God united and attracts unbelievers (John 13:35).

Fourth, Peter exhorts believers to minister to one another according to the gifts they have and as stewards of the grace of God. He concludes the section with a doxology: The goal of the Christian life is to bring glory to God in all that we do through Jesus Christ, to whom belong the glory, power, and dominion forever and ever. Amen.

4:12—5:11

Spiritual Well-Being of the Church

After the doxology in the previous passage, Peter introduces a new section using the term agapētos ("beloved," "dear friends") to refer to his audience. He did the same in 2:11. In this section, Peter goes back to some of the topics he discussed before to amplify them and to emphasize their importance. The main emphasis is on Christian suffering, which frames this section (4:12–19; 5:10). This passage, like the previous one, closes with a doxology (5:11). The topic of glory runs throughout (4:14, 16; 5:1, 4, 10, 11). It deals with suffering and glory (4:12–19), leadership and glory (5:1–5), and submission and glory (5:6–11).

4:12–19. Suffering and Glory. Peter considers suffering in the life of believers to be a threat to their faith and exhorts them to remain loyal to Christ in spite of it. He first argues that we should expect trials in the Christian life. They should not surprise us. We should rejoice when facing them because we have the privilege of participating in Christ's sufferings (v. 13). Suffering in itself is meaningless, Peter seems to be saying, but we rejoice in the midst of it because we are experiencing what Jesus experienced when on earth; we can identify with Him. We will also greatly rejoice in the future when His glory is revealed at the Second Coming. Then we will be free from all suffering forever.

Second, those who are reviled for serving Jesus are blessed, because it indicates that the Spirit of glory and of God rests on them. Suffering demonstrates that believers are under the care of God's glorious Spirit. This conviction and experience enrich the lives of believers. Jesus had already told the disciples not to worry about what to say when they were dragged before human courts, because the Holy Spirit would give them the right words at the right moment (Matt. 10:17–20; Luke 12:11–12). Peter takes this promise a step further, assuring his readers that the Spirit would accompany them beyond the courts and into whatever suffering would be imposed on them. (The sentence "On their part He is blasphemed, but on your part He is glorified" [1 Pet. 4:14] is not found in some Greek manuscripts.)

Third, believers should not be ashamed of suffering for Christ; they should not abandon their faith but should glorify God in their trials. They should praise the Lord, recognizing that He is with them—sustaining them. In order for suffering to have any spiritual value, it needs to be for the right reasons. If a believer suffers as a criminal or meddler (v. 15), then such suffering will bring neither glory to God nor benefit to the believer; it is deserved suffering (see 2:20).

Fourth, Peter argues that the suffering Christians experience is not comparable with the suffering of the wicked at the final judgment. According to him, since the time had come for the final judgment to begin with God's people—servants of the Lord—one could not even begin to imagine the fate of those disobedient to the gospel of God (v. 17). The idea is taken from Ezekiel 9:6, where God begins to judge His people in the temple, and indicates God's people as the first to be judged in the final judgment. Peter quotes Proverbs 11:31 to support his argument. His reference to the righteous being "scarcely saved," "barely saved," or "saved with difficulty" (1 Pet. 4:18) indicates that the goodness of believers does not suffice for their salvation. Only Jesus ensures their salvation, contrasting with the end of the wicked in condemnation and perishing (cf. Ps. 1:4–6).

First Peter 4:17–18 contains an often missed chronological juxtaposition. Peter says it is time for the judgment to begin with God's household, and Peter asks about the telos ("end" or "outcome") of those who do not obey the gospel of God. "Begin" refers to the beginning of judgment and "end" to what was to happen at the end, namely, the destruction of the ungodly. There is an obvious chronological development here: the judgment beginning at the house of God with the righteous and concluding with the condemnation and destruction of the wicked. Peter implies that there are different phases or aspects to the final judgment; it does not end until all is accomplished.

This section concludes with an exhortation (v. 19). Peter appeals to believers who are suffering according to the will of God to commit themselves to Him and to do what is good. It is not that God wants them to suffer but that when they face suffering they must do what is good in obedience to Him. They have assurance that God is faithful and that they can indeed trust their lives (sometimes translated as "souls") to Him, who as Creator will preserve them.

5:1–5. Leadership and Glory. Peter turns now to life within the church and exhorts church leaders to correctly perform their duties. The term "elders" (presbyteros) designates church leaders performing the work of pastors. The exhortation is introduced by some important remarks. First, he writes to them as a co-elder (fellow elder) because of their common responsibility. Second, they also have a common mission: to testify about the redemptive sufferings of Christ (2:21–25; 3:18). This is the very core of the mission of the church and particularly of those appointed as pastors of the flock. Third, they also have a common hope: they will share in the glory that will be revealed. The reference is to the glorious coming of Christ.

The exhortation is now introduced: shepherd the flock of God (5:2; cf. John 21:15–17). They are to watch over the well-being of the flock by protecting them from spiritual wolves (Matt. 7:15) and by providing the spiritual food and water they need. This emphasis on taking good care of the flock is based on the fact that the flock is not theirs but the Lord's, and therefore they are accountable to Him. Peter instructs elders on how to do their job. First they should do it not under compulsion (grudgingly, because they do not have any other option) but willingly. Second, they should not do it to gain personal benefit from it but should guide with eagerness—with a positive disposition and fervor. Third, they should not be domineering, lording it over those entrusted to them (1 Pet. 5:3; cf. Matt. 20:25–26), but should lead by being a good example. Peter assures them that their work will be recognized by the Lord—the Chief Shepherd—at His coming. They will receive from Him the unfading crown of glory, that is, the crown that consists of glory (v. 4). Christ will share His glory with them.

Peter then exhorts the young people in the congregation. In the same way that the elders are expected to submit to Peter's exhortation, the young people are asked to submit to the elders (v. 5). He immediately continues by addressing everyone, exhorting them to be clothed with humility in dealing with each other (some Greek manuscripts specifically add "be submissive to one another," while others omit it). Humility is the opposite of pride. The reason for this exhortation is that God opposes the proud but extends His grace and favor to the humble (cf. v. 5; Prov. 3:34).

5:6–11. Submission and Glory. Peter provides some specific exhortations for church members.

First, he develops the topic of humility, introduced in the previous verse. True humility is based on the recognition of the unique power and greatness of God who, in due time—that is to say, at the coming of Christ—will exalt them (v. 6). Meanwhile, they should cast all of their concerns or anxieties (their trials, sufferings, and fears) on the Lord, for He cares for them (v. 7). Pride is not the solution, but total reliance on God is. Second, Peter calls believers to be sober (be on the alert or be of sound mind) and vigilant, watchful, and alert because they have an enemy (the adversary, the devil) who is ready to oppose and even destroy their faith in the Lord (v. 8).

Third, Peter exhorts them to resist the devil (cf. James 4:7) by remaining firmly established and steadfast in the faith (probably a reference to their faith in Jesus and His teachings; v. 9). The devil seeks ways to inflict suffering on believers everywhere. But God is involved in their battle against the enemy. He who called them to share in His eternal glory through the work of Christ (cf. Rom. 8:30; 2 Thess. 2:13, 14) will provide the grace they need to remain faithful to Him. Yes, they may have to suffer a little more, but God will katartizō ("perfect," "prepare," "restore," or "equip"), confirm, strengthen, and establish them, placing them on a settled, firm, steadfast foundation (1 Pet. 5:10). Peter concludes the passage with a doxology proclaiming that all glory belongs to God, whose dominion will last forever, thus implying that the forces of evil will eventually come to an end (v. 11).

5:12–14
Final Greetings

The last three verses of 1 Peter contain Peter's final greetings to believers. He first introduced Silvanus (or Silas), perhaps his amanuensis or secretary, or the bearer of the letter. He is probably the same person who accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey (cf. Acts 15:22—18:5; 2 Cor. 1:19; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1). In the process of introducing Silvanus, Peter provides a summary of the content of the letter: to exhort and testify that this is the true grace of God (that is, the gospel) on which they were standing and were to continue to stand (1 Pet. 5:12). The epistle is in fact a combination of exhortations and theological expositions calling the readers to stand firmly on it. Peter gave them greetings from "she who is in Babylon" and from Mark (v. 13). Most interpreters identify Babylon with Rome and "she" with the church in Rome. Peter refers to these believers in Rome as "chosen together" or "elect together" with his readers, which suggests that the greetings were from the church (1:1). Peter mentions the greetings of Mark and refers to him as his son. Mark abandoned Paul and Barnabas during Paul's first missionary journey, and when at the beginning of the second Barnabas wanted to take him along, Paul refused. As a result, the two apostles parted ways, Paul taking Silas instead and Barnabas going with Mark (Acts 15:37–41). The trust Barnabas placed in Mark paid off. The once fearful Mark became a stalwart disciple. He not only helped Barnabas in his missionary endeavors but later again became a close companion of Paul (Col. 4:10; 2 Tim. 4:11; Philem. 1:24) and, of course, of Peter, under whose guidance Mark composed the Gospel that bears his name. Peter encouraged the church to greet one another with a kiss of love (1 Pet. 5:14) as an expression of affectionate love.

Peter's final greeting to the believers is one of peace. The more common greeting formula was grace and peace (e.g., Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3; 2 Cor. 1:2; Gal. 1:3; Eph. 1:2; Phil. 1:2; Col. 1:2; 1 Thess. 1:1; Rev. 1:4). The phrase is a prayer for the well-being of the church—for a life that is totally integrated, free from inner disruption in their mutual union with Christ (see 1 Pet. 1:2). It reminds us of the words of Jesus to the disciples in the upper room on the evening after the resurrection (Luke 24:36; John 20:19, 21) and again a week later (John 20:26). It seems that the experience of seeing the resurrected Christ while congregated in fear in the upper room left such a lasting impression on Peter that now—in his own parting words to his readers—he wants to share the same beautiful greeting that Jesus shared on that wonderful evening. The church continues to experience this peace in the midst of suffering because Christ strengthens it and because its living hope is grounded in the resurrection of Christ (1 Pet. 1:3).

2 PETER

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The earliest copy of this letter dates back to around the third or fourth century A.D. It bears the title "The Second Epistle of Peter" and is part of a papyrus codex that also includes 1 Peter and Jude. Unlike many other NT epistles, this title occurs across the manuscript tradition with little variation. The only minor difference is its designation, in a few manuscripts, as a "catholic" (meaning "universal" or "general"; see 1 Peter: Introduction) epistle and/or the identification of Peter as an "apostle."

The opening words of the letter identify the Apostle Simon Peter as its author. Although Simon was a common Jewish name, the name Peter (Aram. Cephas) was not. By using the two names together, the author underlines that this letter was written by the apostle who received this nickname from Jesus himself (John 1:42). This is confirmed later, when the author identifies himself as an eyewitness of Jesus's transfiguration (2 Pet. 1:16–18; cf. Matt. 17:1–5).

From very early times, the church has puzzled over how this letter and the letter of 1 Peter could both be written by the same person. The style of writing, the terminology, and the themes differ greatly between the two letters. Likely for this reason, it took several centuries before 2 Peter was universally recognized as part of the NT canon.

This does not necessitate—as is often argued—that Peter was not the actual author of this letter. The letters do not differ as much thematically as is often suggested, and the cause of those themes that do differ may be traced to the brevity of the letters and the different situations addressed by each (cf. 2 Pet. 3:10–12; 1 Pet. 1:13). A reasonable explanation for other differences is Peter's likely use of a secretary, or amanuensis, in writing one or both letters. (1 Pet. 5:12 may be referring to Sylvanus [Silas] as the amanuensis who helped with 1 Peter; cf. 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1). In the Greco-Roman world, it was common to use an amanuensis to assist in the writing of a letter. An amanuensis could take word-for-word dictation. But additionally, as with secretaries today, an amanuensis who shared the understandings and commitments of the author could, where needed, assist in selecting the wording and phraseology that would most effectively convey the author's message to his chosen audience.

Date. If the reference to an earlier letter in 2 Peter 3:1–2 is to 1 Peter, this letter was written after 1 Peter. Second Peter 1:14 suggests that it was probably written near the end of Peter's life. Early church writers agree that Peter died during Nero's persecution of the Christians in Rome—about A.D. 65.

Backgrounds. If this letter was written to the same people as 1 Peter, the original audience can be identified as those who were pilgrim exiles dispersed or scattered throughout "Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia" (1 Pet. 1:1). These recipients of 1 Peter were largely Gentile (1 Pet. 1:18; 2:10; 4:3). A number of them had likely been brought to Christ by the Apostle Paul (Acts 16:6; 18:23). A close examination of the author's concerns in 2 Peter makes evident that those to whom this letter was written were in danger of being distracted from their commitment to God and to living out His work in their lives. False teachers and scoffers questioned certain truths they had been taught about Jesus and His coming and suggested that they were free to follow after their own sinful desires.

Second Peter is not concerned with pinpointing the exact identity of these false teachers or with providing a full description of their beliefs and actions. Peter, speaking from a prophetic viewpoint, initially says that they will come (2:1), but later speaks of them as already present among the believers (2:10, 13). This suggests that some were already present or would be soon after the receipt of this letter.

It appears that these false teachers had once followed Jesus (2:20, 21) but had concocted erroneous doctrines that in some way denied Him (2:1) and twisted the NT teachings about Christian liberty (2:19). In doing so, they apparently questioned the reality of the judgment and thus placed themselves among the scoffers who had been predicted as coming in the last days (2:3, 9; 3:3–4). As is generally the case, these erroneous beliefs were closely connected with evil actions centered in following their own sinful desires (2:10, 13–14). These actions included covetousness or greed (2:3, 14), sexual immorality (2:14, 18), and arrogance in the face of powers greater than themselves (2:10). In the ferment of philosophical beliefs in the cities of the first century, such ideas would not have been uncommon. The false teachers were possibly influenced by the agnostic philosophy of Epicureanism or were early predecessors of the Gnostics, who troubled the church greatly in the mid to late second century.

Theology and Purpose. The main concern running throughout the Second Epistle of Peter is that people need to be ready to meet the Lord with joy at His coming (1:4, 10–11, 16; 3:11–13). As Peter makes clear in both the beginning and ending of this letter, such readiness comes through personally knowing Jesus Christ and the Father, who sent Him (1:2–3; 3:18). By this means God has made grace and peace available—together with everything needed for life and godliness—and believers are urged to diligently take hold of these provisions by putting this reality into action in their own lives (1:3–8). Despite the claims of false teachers and scoffers to the contrary (2:1—3:4), Peter assures believers that the promise of Jesus's coming is no myth; Peter was given a glimpse of Jesus's coming glory, and the prophecies of His coming in the OT were inspired by the Holy Spirit Himself (1:16–21). The Lord will come at His appointed time, and it will be a terrifying event engulfing all wickedness in complete destruction (3:3–10). This truth should cause believers to soberly examine their own lives in a spirit of repentance and to urge others to do the same (3:11–12). However, those who have accepted His cleansing and are diligently growing in godliness need not despair but may be at peace; they can instead look forward to a new earth, which God Himself will supply for them (1:11; 3:13, 18).

Literary Features. Second Peter is written in the standard letter format of the day. It opens with an identification of the author and the addressees, followed by a blessing. Since no single church or individual is named, it is likely a general or circular letter, meant to be passed from house church to house church. In form, 2 Peter also would likely have been heard as a farewell address—a record of an individual's last words for a particular person or group. As with similar works, the author states the imminence of his death (1:13–15) and warns of what his audience was to face before the certain and blessed coming of the Lord. In tone and content, 2 Peter is similar to Paul's last words to the elders of the Ephesian church, reported in Acts 20:17–38. As the last words of the beloved Peter, this letter would have been read with special interest and solemnity.

A word must be said about the relationship between 2 Peter and Jude. Many concerns found in 2 Peter 2 regarding false teachers are also found in the letter of Jude, sometimes with the same exact Greek wording. Such an integration of one author's writings into the work of another was normal in that day and age and was considered an honor. It appears that Peter most likely made use of Jude, since Jude exhibits a clear structure that is missing in the second half of 2 Peter. As noted in the commentary on Jude, it would have been difficult for Jude to have constructed that part of his letter out of what Peter had written. If this is the case, Peter apparently came across Jude's letter and felt it contained aspects that were important to pass on to his own readers along with the other concerns he was sharing. Such a decision is not out of harmony with the diverse ways in which the Holy Spirit inspired individuals to communicate God's message elsewhere in Scripture (see commentary on Luke 1:1–4).

COMMENTARY

1:1–2

Letter Opening

A letter from Jesus's friend and apostle, Simon Peter, would have been received by early Christians with great respect and joy. The author, however, does not emphasize his own importance but identifies himself instead as a doulos (translated as "bondservant," "slave," or simply "servant"). Being a doulos meant that he was not great or powerful in his own right but that he belonged wholly to Jesus Christ and was dependent on Him. As Jesus's apostle, it was Peter's work to faithfully represent his Master and to communicate His word (see also Ex. 32:13; Titus 1:1). By identifying the letter's recipients simply as ones having the same precious faith that he had, Peter underlines the fact that their trust and allegiance to God carried no less value or privilege than that of the chosen apostles who knew Jesus face-to-face. Such faith is not obtained by human effort, as Peter notes. Rather it is Jesus—in His righteousness—who supplies it. By the use of a single article before the phrase "God and Savior" in 2 Peter 1:1, Jesus is clearly identified not only as Savior but as God as well. This is one of the clearest declarations in Scripture of Jesus's divinity. Peter recognizes God the Father and Jesus as two distinct persons, yet at times does not distinguish between the two when he uses the words "God" and "Lord" (see 1:2–3; 3:8–12).

Peter expresses his wish for the believers' "grace and peace"—a common greeting in the NT (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:3; 2 John 1:3). He does not treat this greeting merely as a formality, however. Instead, he goes on to point out how one can receive these two precious blessings. They are received through the knowledge (epignōsis) of God. Knowing God is one of the most important themes in 2 Peter. Not only can it bring grace and peace but, as 2 Peter later makes clear, it can protect believers from deception and make eternal benefits possible.

The Gospel Message Summarized

The first main section of the letter explores more deeply the incredible provisions God has made available to those who know Him. It then explains what receiving these blessings from God will mean in the lives of believers.

1:3–4. What God Has Provided. Through knowing Christ, believers receive everything they need to live the abundant life He has provided even now and to live it with godliness (v. 3). The Greek word used here is eusebeia, meaning to live one's whole life in devotion to God. It, along with its alternative (asebēs; "ungodly") are key words throughout the letter (1:3, 6, 7; 2:5–7, 9; 3:11). Even one's own belief in God is not due to human initiative. Rather, it is He who first called and then provided for us (cf. 1:1). The glory and virtue (arête; "goodness, "excellence") of His character—evidenced above all in Jesus Christ—is what draws us to Him. Further, because of this goodness, He has showered us with extraordinary promises (v. 4). Many of these have already been fulfilled in Jesus's life and sacrifice on our behalf, others are being fulfilled in our lives today, and the rest will come to completion at His return (1:11; 3:9–10, 13).

God's purpose in providing all of this is that believers be fully reshaped into the divine image He originally planned for them (Gen. 1:27). As Peter points out in the verses that follow, this is

Knowledge in 2 Peter

Although it is not clearly evident in English translations, 2 Peter uses three main Greek word roots for knowledge, each pointing to somewhat different, though overlapping, ideas.

1. Gnōsis, a common noun used to speak of knowledge, generally carries the idea of comprehending or understanding something experientially. Second Peter uses it (and its related verb ginōskō) for knowing Jesus Himself (3:18) and the reliable messages He passed on through His prophets and apostles (1:20–21; 3:3–5; cf. 3:17). Such knowledge of Him is to grow deeper and deeper as one matures in the Christian life (1:5–7; 3:18).

2. Epignōsis, a related and somewhat more intensive noun, is always used in 2 Peter for the experience of knowing Jesus. By it, 2 Peter indicates not simply knowledge about Jesus but the reality that one has come into relationship with Him in a personal and transformational way and made a commitment to Him as Lord and Savior (1:2, 3, 8; 2:20). Peter uses the verb form of this word when speaking of knowing "the way of righteousness" found in Jesus Christ (2:21).

3. Oida is a verb used in 2 Peter for possessing information about, or knowing how to do, a particular thing (1:14; 2:9). In the face of what false teachers and scoffers claimed, Peter points to knowledge about Christ and His message as the most reliable and valuable knowledge (1:12).

not something we must await passively until we are changed at His coming but an adventure that begins immediately. Because we know Him personally and have the benefit of all the promises He has fulfilled and is fulfilling in Christ, we are, even now, by His generosity, sharers in the love and virtue and power that are essential to His nature. Partaking of God's own nature involves leaving behind the moral and, ultimately, the physical corruption caused by epithymia (a Greek word that can refer not just to sexual lust but to any sort of desire). Peter speaks here of sinful desires. In contrast to those whom Peter speaks of later as being slaves of corruption or depravity (2 Pet. 2:19), those who have responded in faith to God's call have—through His provision—already escaped such slavery and are free to act as they were created to be.

1:5–7. Living Out God's Purpose. With all these things already provided by God, believers need only to take hold of what He has already made theirs—by putting it into practice in their own lives (cf. 1 Pet. 1:13–16). To describe what this looks like, Peter uses a well-known literary form called a "virtue list." In such a list, the quality understood as the foundation for all the others is placed first and the culminating (or capstone) quality is placed last. Though a number of these virtues were highly valued at that time, by grounding this list in faith and crowning it with love, Peter set apart this list of prime Christian qualities from all other virtue lists of the day.

The first five qualities in the list focus primarily on the internal aspects of the believer's character. Faith in Jesus is often spoken of as the beginning point of the Christian life (John 1:12; 1 Pet. 1:20–21). Since it has already been provided by the righteousness of God (2 Pet. 1:1), it now waits to be put into practice by the believer. Aretē connotes "virtue," "goodness," or "moral excellence" and here is suggested to grow out of a genuine faith in God. Verse 3 has identified this quality as a divine one that first draws the believer to God. Accurate knowledge (gnōsis) is essential for ongoing growth in the Christian life. Self-control (v. 6) allows these qualities to become reality—restraining sinful emotions and desires and choosing the good that God has provided. Perseverance enables one to be consistent in holding out against temptation and practicing the positive qualities God makes possible.

The last three qualities are more outwardly focused. Godliness (eusebeia) involves the reverence and loyalty we give to God through these and other qualities and actions. Again, God has been identified as the One who makes godliness possible (1:3; cf. 3:11). Brotherly kindness or mutual affection refers to the kind of love shared within a human family. The NT calls for this kind of love among believers also—who are to live as a family in Christ (e.g., Acts 2:44–45; Rom. 12:10; 1 Pet. 1:22). Agapē love leads a person to seek to benefit others even at one's own expense. It reaches beyond the positive love for family to include everyone we meet, friend or foe. It is a central defining quality of God (1 John 4:8) and is the highest and most encompassing quality of Christian behavior (cf. Matt. 22:37–40; 1 John 3:23; 4:7).

1:8–11. Eternal Results. Peter now turns to the long-term results of one's choices in response to what God has done. While God calls and provides for all, two kinds of Christians are shown to exist: One group has these qualities (v. 8) growing in their lives—arising from their relationship with Jesus (cf. vv. 2–4; John 15:1–8; Gal. 5:16–24)—thus giving clear evidence of the surety of their calling and election. Those in the second group lack these qualities (2 Pet. 1:9) because they have allowed themselves to become blind to the cleansing Jesus has already provided for them (cf. 2:21–22; Mark 4:19).

The first group is encouraged to continue to live out what God has done. This is not in order to earn salvation; they were cleansed and chosen by God when they came to Him and were baptized (1:9–10; Acts 2:38; 1 John 1:9). Rather, it is so that what God has already given them can be brought to completion when He comes. Like a fruitful grapevine or fig tree, it is the work of God through their knowledge of (that is, their connection with) Jesus that enables them to bless the Gardener and bear fruit (Is. 5:1–2; Luke 13:6–9). The Greek word pleonazō (2 Pet. 1:8) has the basic meaning here of "increasing," "abounding," or "becoming more and more." Peter's assurance to them is a powerful one: if you are growing in these qualities, you will most certainly not stumble (ptaiō; meaning here, "meet with destruction"; v. 10). Indeed, while the believers were, in v. 5, encouraged to take responsibility to add (epichorēgeō) positive qualities to their faith, in v. 11 believers are assured that it is God who supplies (using the same Greek word, epichorēgeō) entrance into the kingdom.

The second group is mentioned here only briefly to warn against blindly missing out on the glorious future God has planned. Instead of living out the cleansing He has provided, these people return to the very things from which He had cleansed them (cf. 2:21–22). Jesus and the prophets warn of the ultimate consequences of a barren and unfruitful plant (a metaphor for someone who is ineffective and unproductive) that refuses to benefit from the Gardener's provisions (Is. 5:3–5; Matt. 3:10; 7:19). In 2 Peter 2, Peter will further reveal the reason for his deep concern that these believers act on what God has provided.

Peter insisted that there were only these two options, and he fervently urged believers to put the effort of their whole heart into the diligent action commended in v. 5, directing their attention toward the ultimate and joyous culmination of their hopes in the kingdom of Jesus. By concluding with the promise of a rich welcome and entrance into the kingdom abundantly supplied for them, Peter ends the first main section of the letter as it began—with the focus on what Jesus has done.

1:12–21

A Message Worth Remembering

In view of his impending death, Peter expressed his concern that believers keep in mind the good news he had just summarized and trust firmly in the promise of Jesus's coming. He demonstrated the reliability of these things on the basis of his own glimpse of Jesus's future glory at the transfiguration and of the Spirit-inspired nature of the OT prophecies.

1:12–15. The Urgency of Remembering These Things. This paragraph contains the purpose statement of Peter's letter. His audience already knew (oida) the present truth, that is, the body of truth about Jesus and His coming kingdom (v. 12). Yet because of the eternal importance of how we respond to God's graciousness, Peter's goal was to be sure that they would always have a reminder of "these things." For weak humans, it is all too easy to become blind and forgetful (v. 9) and thereby distracted from the essentials of the gospel (2:2, 3, 14, 18–19). This is why Peter summarized the good news for them in vv. 1–11. Peter's concern was made even more urgent by the expectation that he would soon die. In this prediction, he seems to recall Jesus's prophecy about his death in John 21:18–19 (cf. 13:36; early church tradition tells us that Peter was crucified upside down by the emperor Nero). Peter spoke of his death as removing or storing his tent—referring to his body. This was a familiar way of speaking about death for the Greeks among Peter's audience. It likely serves here to emphasize the temporary nature of human life on earth, in contrast to the eternal and incorruptible life the believer will receive from the Lord at His coming (2 Pet. 1:4; cf. 1 Cor. 15:44, 50–54; 2 Cor. 5:1).

As these were likely Peter's last words to this group of people, he must have chosen them with great care to ensure that he had communicated the most essential things for them in as persuasive a manner as possible. In several ways, his message is similar to other farewell speeches in Scripture, like those of Moses (Deut. 33) and Joseph (Gen. 50:24–26). Like them, Peter was speaking of things past, recalling truths he held most important, and warning of dangers to come. By speaking in this way, he was underlining the gravity of what he had to say. And by communicating these teachings in a letter, he was ensuring that his instruction would always be available to them.

1:16–21. The Reliability of the Promise of His Coming. In vv. 16–18, Peter gives the first of two reasons why the things he was reminding the believers of are reliable and worth keeping closely in mind. As the rest of 2 Peter reveals, there were some who were suggesting that what Peter taught about Jesus's coming was not worth remembering at all but was instead a cleverly crafted myth (1:16; cf. 3:3–4). In reality, however, it was likely these doubters were teaching such fables (2:1, 3, 18; 3:3–7). The reference to the coming of Jesus that Peter emphasizes here almost always in the NT points toward Jesus's future coming in glory to set up His kingdom (e.g., Matt. 24:3, 27; 1 Cor. 15:23; cf. 2 Pet. 1:11; 3:4). Power is identified as a central aspect of that coming (3:12; Dan. 7:14; Matt. 24:30; 2 Thess. 2:8) in an even greater sense than was evidenced by Jesus at His first coming (Luke 4:14, 36).

The first evidence Peter gives of the certainty of Jesus's future coming is the majestic and excellent glory with which God surrounded Jesus at the transfiguration—an event witnessed by Peter personally, along with James and John (Mark 9:2–7). Jesus Himself had pointed toward this transfiguration event as a foretaste of His Second Coming when He predicted, only a few days earlier, that some of His disciples would see the kingdom of God with power (Mark 9:1). Jesus's transfiguration was an especially assured indication of His honor and glory (2 Pet. 1:17), for it climaxed in words sent from heaven by God's own voice. In ancient culture, such a fatherly declaration was essential in order for a son to be accepted as carrying his father's full approval and authority.

The eyewitness evidence of the transfiguration is in agreement with, and provides further confirmation of, the prophetic word or message (v. 19) that had pointed forward long ago to the coming of God's kingdom. This term ("prophetic word/message") was used in Peter's day to refer to writings of the OT—either as a whole or with reference to one particular prophet or prophecy. It is possible that Peter may also have been thinking here of NT prophecies about Jesus's Second Coming (e.g., Matt. 24:27–31; 1 Thess. 4:15–17; cf. 2 Pet. 3:16).

At the mention of the prophetic word, Peter pauses momentarily in his demonstration of the reliability of his message to emphasize that the words of Scripture are essential for the believer to prosechō ("heed" or "pay attention to")—not simply to read but to carefully consider and devote oneself to what is written (Ps. 1:1–3; John 8:31–32). Believers need not stumble around in darkness as those who do not benefit from the light of God's word to show them the way do (Ps. 119:105; Prov. 6:23; John 3:19; cf. 2 Pet. 1:9; 3:5). Instead, a dedicated study of God's word will provide guidance and hope until Jesus comes again, bringing the full light of day into our world and our hearts (Num. 24:17; Is. 60:1; Mal. 4:2; Rev. 22:16).

Turning back to his larger concern, Peter insists that as believers study Scripture, they keep the reliability of what they are studying prōtos ("first"), or above all in their minds (cf. 2 Pet. 3:3). The promise of Jesus's coming, along with the rest of the teachings of Scripture, is fully trustworthy because it did not come about by the prophets' own private interpretation. Rather, as 1:21 goes on to say, these men were moved by the Holy Spirit. Indeed, as Scripture affirms elsewhere, those who seek to interpret God's word should not put their trust in their own private interpretations but instead seek and be open to the leading of the Spirit (John 5:39; 7:17; 16:13, cf. 2 Pet. 2:1; 3:16).

Peter's words regarding the prophets being moved or carried by the Holy Spirit speak against any suggestion that the words of Scripture were formed by human will (1:21) or were based on cleverly crafted myths (1:16). At the same time, there is no suggestion that the Holy Spirit dictated the exact words the prophets were to say. Rather, what the prophets communicated originated in and was guided by the Holy Spirit, with the result being that they can be trusted to faithfully convey what God wished to reveal (see "Revelation and Inspiration of the Bible," p. 11).

Beware of False Messengers

Peter here warns that, just as in OT times there were both godly, Spirit-led prophets and false prophets, so false teachers would exist in his day. In chapter 2 he describes the false teachers his audience would face and makes known the certainty of their destruction.

2:1–3. False Prophets and False Teachers. It would be a mistake to assume a major break between chapters 1 and 2, for Peter next makes another point regarding OT prophets. There were not only inspired prophets in OT times but also false prophets, whose messages were not from God (v. 1; Jer. 14:14; Ezek. 13:2–7). These false prophets sought their own advantage by insisting that people need not worry about preparing for a coming judgment (Jer. 6:13–14, 17–18; Ezek. 13:10; Mic. 3:5–11). As a result, they were soon to meet their just reward (Deut. 18:20; Jer. 14:15).

Similarly, there would be false teachers among Peter's audience. While these may not have claimed prophetic inspiration, they evidenced similar characteristics to the false prophets (2 Pet. 2:2–22; 3:3–4) and sought to lead believers away from the good news of Jesus Christ (1:2–11; cf. Matt. 7:15–23). Indeed, their behavior must have been remarkably bold and blatant for Peter to speak so strongly against them. Peter appears to draw on much of the same language used in Jude 4–19 to warn against false prophets (for more on the relationship of 2 Peter and Jude, see 2 Peter: Introduction).

Peter introduces these false teachers by identifying three of their key characteristics, paired with three important consequences of their teachings: (1) They would bring in destructive and divisive ways of thinking, even denying Jesus (2 Pet. 2:1). Peter does not spell out here exactly how they would deny Him—from the rest of chapters 2 and 3, it appears that it at least would involve denying Jesus's authority or power to judge. Their teachings, Peter says, would result in destruction without delay. (2) The wicked way of life advocated by these teachers would be remarkably popular among believers and would thereby cause outsiders to reject and revile the "way of truth" to which God had called them (v. 2; Is. 48:17; 59:8; Luke 1:79; Acts 9:2; cf. 2 Pet. 1:3–8). (3) In reality, the false teachers did not do these things from good motives but out of covetousness or greed, hoping to gain things such as influence, honor, immoral pleasures, or monetary support from followers (2 Pet. 2:3). Again, Peter insists that their destruction was most certainly on its way, though it had not yet actively come about.

2:4–10a. The Certainty of Judgment. The next seven verses make plain how important it is to recognize the certainty of the judgment that awaits the ungodly, with Peter also assuring his readers of God's faithful deliverance of His righteous ones from this destruction. Peter demonstrates these realities by pointing to three moments in biblical history in which judgment was clearly brought on a group who had rebelled against God.

Though Peter does not give details about the first example (2:4), it is best identified with the casting down of the angels who joined Satan in warring against God before sin came into our world (Rev. 12:7–9; cf. Is. 14:12–15; Jude 1:6). These beings were cast out of heaven and were confined to darkness to await the final execution of their sentence following the coming of Jesus. (The word tartaros, often translated as "hell," was the place where Greek mythology depicted Zeus casting the Titans, the primeval powers of chaos, when he defeated them—an analogy many among Peter's Greek-speaking audience would have easily understood.)

The second example points to God's unmaking of the ancient world (2 Pet. 2:5). The inhabitants of this world are described simply as "ungodly" (asebēs), meaning that instead of living out the godliness (eusebeia) God sought to provide (see on 1:3), they were acting as if there was no God. In contrast, Noah, who was rescued along with seven others, is called a "preacher of righteousness." Righteousness (dikaiosynē) refers to a state of being in right and just relations with both God and humankind.

The final example of certain judgment deals with a third vivid instance of large-scale supernatural destruction in the ancient world: that of the ungodly people of Sodom and Gomorrah (2:6–8). The focus in Peter's telling falls on Lot, who is twice described as righteous (dikaios; vv. 7–8). While the Genesis account shows Lot to have been a weak and foolish man at times (e.g., Gen. 13:7–13; 19:7–8, 30–38), Peter attests that he hated the filthy, depraved conduct around him and left willingly when called (cf. Gen. 19:1–30). Thereby, despite his flaws, Peter speaks of him as righteous.

No details are given regarding the sins leading to these three instances of destruction, although some attention is given to the positive traits of Noah and Lot, whom God chose to deliver. Rather, Peter gives primary attention to the inevitability of the end that must come on the unjust or unrighteous (in Greek, the adikos; the opposite of the righteous). He also refers to the fact that this punishment is certain for them, although it has not been fully carried out yet (cf. 3:7). At the same time, Peter assures believers that God is still able to preserve the godly (eusebēs; cf. eusebeia in 1:3, 6–7). Peter points to two things particularly deserving of these consequences: unchecked sinful desires (or "lusts") and despising of authority. He will pick up and expand on these in the next passage.

2:10b–16. Characteristics of the False Teachers. Although Peter first introduces the false teachers by saying that they were to come (2:1), from v. 10 on he makes evident that some indeed were already present. The first characteristic of the false teachers that Peter elaborates on seems to be related to the reference, in vv. 9–10a, to despising authority. It is not certain to whom the term doxa (lit., "glories") refers. Some translate it as "dignitaries," and others as "celestial beings" or "angelic majesties." Jude, in a parallel passage, uses this same word to speak of the devil (Jude 8–10), and by it, Peter may additionally be referring to the evil powers allied with Satan (cf. Eph. 3:10; 6:12). While these are all without a doubt evil, mere fragile humans ought to speak cautiously about beings more intelligent and powerful than themselves. Some have suggested that Peter uses the term doxa to refer to all heavenly beings, although that seems to be contradicted by the reference to angels in 2 Pet. 2:11. Either is certainly beyond what the false teachers, or any human being, could understand (v. 12). Peter's main point in mentioning these "glories" is clear: the false teachers' derogatory speech about them was demonstrating how blindly presumptuous, brash, self-willed, and arrogant the teachers truly were (v. 10).

The lustful behavior noted in v. 10a is further discussed in vv. 12b–14. As if they had no powers of rational choice or self-control, they were acting unashamedly to please their own corrupt desires, deceiving others into joining in with them and becoming the willing objects of their lusts. By stating that they were engaging in these deceptions even while feasting with the believers (v. 13), Peter seems to imply that they were even bringing their sin and deception into the meals celebrating the Last Supper of the Lord (Mark 14:12–25; 1 Cor. 11:17–34).

In describing these false teachers as covetous or greedy (2 Pet. 2:14) and following the way of Balaam (v. 15), Peter also underlines that they were really interested not in the good of those who were following them but rather in their own self-indulgence. With ironic humor, Peter points out that even Balaam's donkey showed more sanity than Balaam did (2:14–16). Church leaders should be careful not to drift into the realm of false teachers like Balaam, using their ministries to gather benefits for themselves—bringing shame on the church by immoral behavior. It is the challenge of every believer to recognize the symptoms Peter describes—in oneself and in one's leaders—and steer far clear of them.

2:17–22. The Degrading Nature of Their Promises. Peter's opening analogies (v. 17) in the next section make vivid the reality that these false prophets promised what they did not and could not deliver. Nothing is so disappointing as a waterless spring to a thirsty soul. According to some manuscripts, the false teachers are like a type of fog (omichlē) or mist—defined by Aristotle and others as a haze that precedes dry weather. According to others, they are like a cloud (nephelē). The description of empty, pompous and arrogant words further underlines this same point.

One means used by the false teachers to deceive believers becomes apparent in vv. 18–19. They had apparently told their hearers, many of whom were new Christians, that they were at liberty or had the freedom to act in whatever way they might desire. This suggests that they likely questioned the reality of a final judgment (cf. 3:3–7). It is possible that they were distorting the teachings of Paul in order to support this false idea (cf. 3:16). Even beyond the fact that their actions were corrupt and bound for destruction, they were also actually placing the doer in a position not of freedom but of slavery to their own wrong desires. This image of being overcome or mastered and thus taken into bondage derives from the ancient practice of selling those who surrendered in battle as slaves. The certain destruction promised for these false teachers shows how untrue their promises of liberty were. The corruption they spread contrasts tragically with Peter's own earlier promise that believers would be enabled to escape corruption (1:3–4).

To have actually known (epiginōskō) Jesus, His goodness to them, and His plan for them and then to have rejected all of it only makes their guilt and ruin more profound (2:20–22). Peter must have shaken his head in despair at these unaccountable choices. The proverb in v. 22 combines a saying from Proverbs 26:11 with another well-known saying of the time to challenge believers to truly recognize the ludicrousness of the actions advocated by the false teachers.

3:1–16

The Certainty of the Lord's Coming

In this final section of his letter, Peter demonstrates the error of doubters concerning Jesus's Second Coming, urging believers to prepare for that great and awesome day.

3:1–4. Some Will Scoff at the Promise of His Coming. As in his first letter—probably the epistle we know as 1 Peter—Peter wished to help sincere believers to keep two things firmly in mind: Understanding how easy it is for people to be distracted by things of lesser importance, he sought to remind them of the reliable messages spoken in the past by the OT prophets (v. 2), messages which culminate in the ultimate fulfillment of all things at Jesus's Second Coming. Peter also wanted them to treasure in their minds the instruction or command—in the singular but broadly of the whole of Jesus's instruction—that the apostles had passed on from the Lord (2:21; cf. Rom. 7:12).

Peter and the False Teachers

Peter's words about the false teachers in 2 Peter 2—like Jesus's woes upon the Pharisees—evidence that there are moments when it is necessary to speak strongly in the face of stubbornly held and blatantly evil practices condemned by Scripture. The Bible witnesses, however, that such speech should be used only on the rarest of occasions, when all other attempts have failed. Jesus Himself reasoned earnestly on many occasions with the Pharisees. Even when there was no other way to get their attention or to help the people see the truth about them, Jesus spoke with mournful woes rather than proud arrogance. The principles of Scripture regarding gentle and courteous speech are clearly spelled out on many occasions (Prov. 10:19; 15:2, 18; Col. 3:8; James 1:19–20; 3:1–18; 4:11) and are centered on Jesus's instruction to love one's neighbor as oneself (Matt. 22:38–40; cf. Lev. 19:18), and to treat them as one would want to be treated (Matt. 7:12).

At the same time, believers need to be prepared to deal with scoffers, who Peter says would come in the last days (2 Pet. 3:3). Peter does not seem to point to a specific prophecy here. It may have been something Jesus spoke of with the apostles (v. 2; cf. Matt. 24:45–51). Certainly Malachi 2:17—3:2 deals with similar behavior by pointing to the coming of the Lord. Mockers who questioned the "coming" of God's judgment appeared often in the experience of the OT prophets. These prophets, like Peter, predicted their doom (Ps. 73:9–11; Is. 5:16–20), even when it was right upon them (2 Chr. 36:16–17; Jer. 5:11–14; Ezek. 12:21–23).

While from our vantage point in the twenty-first century we look to the future for the completion of "the last days" (2 Pet. 3:3), in Peter's mind—as elsewhere in the NT—the last days began with the first coming of Jesus (Acts 2:15–17; 1 Pet. 1:20; 1 John 2:18; Jude 1:18; cf. Heb. 1:2). Thus, while such scoffers should continue to be expected and even to increase as time passes and the coming of the Lord draws near, Peter seems to find in the experience of the church a partial fulfillment of this prophecy.

Indeed, the false teachers spoken of in chapter 2 seem to have been on his mind as he wrote 3:3–4; for a main characteristic of these too was living according to their own desires (2:10, 13–14, 18). Further, the false teachers' claims to liberty (2:19–20), which Peter counters in demonstrating the certainty of judgment (2:4–10), fits well with the scoffers' sarcastic question of 3:4. As so often even today, the attraction of corrupt living appears as the initial problem, and the questioning of biblical teaching arises as a justification for unprincipled actions. The scoffers' rationalized that the earth was still pretty much as it had been since the "fathers" (i.e., ancestors) "fell asleep" (i.e., died). Here, Peter likely refers to the deaths of the OT patriarchs, the common biblical meaning for "the fathers" or "ancestors." Some also suggest that it could refer to the first Christians, who had expected Jesus's immediate return but who had died before His coming.

3:5–10. The Promise of His Coming is Sure. Peter's answer to the scoffers' claims is in two parts, beginning first, in vv. 5–7, with their rationale for doubting the coming of Jesus. To their claim that things simply proceed as they have since the time of the patriarchs (3:4), Peter responds with three parallel statements demonstrating God's active authority over the affairs of the earth: First, they were forgetting that God is the One who created, by His own word, both the heavens (Gen. 1:1, 6–8; Ps. 33:6) and the earth (2 Pet. 3:5). In the Greek, Peter's words at the end of v. 5 indicate that the earth came out of water (Gen. 1:1) and by means of water (in that land appeared because of the gathering together of the waters into seas; Gen. 1:9–10). Second, by God's word and with water, the world He had created was destroyed in a great flood (2 Pet. 3:5–6; cf. Gen. 6–8). Clearly, all things had not remained as they were since Creation as the scoffers claimed. Third (2 Pet. 3:7), by this same word the heavens and the earth are even now being preserved until God is ready to bring judgment on them—this time not by water but by fire (Is. 66:15; Mal. 4:1). Peter drives home his point by noting that this judgment would come on the ungodly, implying especially these scoffers in their lustful behavior.

Having demonstrated that God is definitely in charge and will carry out His promise in His own time, Peter turns in 3:8–10 to the scoffers' initial question of v. 4 regarding the promise of Christ's coming. Peter had just finished pointing out things the scoffers were forgetting (v. 5) and now urged believers not to forget (v. 8). His initial point here is that God's view of time is different from ours, alluding to one of those reliable declarations of OT Scripture that he had spoken of earlier (Ps. 90:4; cf. Ps. 39:4–5). Neither Peter nor Moses advocated any sort of specific symbolic numbering system for calculating prophetic time in which one day would represent exactly one thousand years. Rather, he warned of the unexpected nature of the Lord's coming (2 Pet. 3:10).

Instead of worrying that the Lord is slow to keep His promise, believers can be grateful for His long-suffering/patient compassion in allowing time for all who are willing to repent (v. 9; Ex. 34:6; Joel 2:12–13; cf. Hab. 2:3). Repentance (metanoia) means a change or turning of one's heart to live in submission to God (Luke 3:8; Acts 26:20; 1 Thess. 1:9–10). Such repentance is appropriate not just for false teachers, Gentiles, or non-Christians but for any who have slipped away from their commitment to God (Luke 3:7–8; James 4:1–10; Rev. 2:5, 19–20).

The day of the Lord's coming will indeed arrive, though unexpectedly (2 Pet. 3:10). Peter's vivid description of this arrival is a dreadful and sobering one. One can almost feel the intense heat melting the elements and hear the roaring noise of the heavens being destroyed. The final word in the verse varies in different manuscripts. Some manuscripts have the word katakaēsetai ("will be burned up"), while others have heurethēsetai ("will be exposed/laid bare/found"). The textual evidence suggests that, rather than "burned up," we should keep the verb heuriskō, meaning literally "will be found/disclosed." This seems to suggest the idea that all things done on this earth will be "found out" by God at the judgment (compare the use of "found" in 3:14; cf. 1 Pet. 1:7).

3:11–16. What His Coming Means for Believers. Peter next turns from the scene of destruction at the Lord's coming to suggest implications for those professing to believe. In view of the fearsome portrayal in the previous verse, the first point is that believers will, of course, not want to be a part of this destruction (v. 11). Certainly, those who have accepted by faith the cleansing and empowering of God spoken of in 1:3–11 will seek godly and holy ways of living, set apart from the corruption of the false teachers and the world. Yet sinful desires, such as those practiced by the scoffers and false teachers, are always a temptation. The reality of the coming destruction, described a second time in 3:12, is a reminder of the ultimate outcome of following such desires.

The best way to remain prepared for His coming is to be constantly looking forward to it (v. 12). The word translated here as "looking for" (prosdokaō) is used three times in vv. 12–14 and suggests not just patient waiting but confident expectation. Peter does not explain here how one might hasten or speed His coming, however v. 9 has revealed that one aspect of God's waiting is His desire for people to repent. Coming to Him in repentance for our own wrongdoing, and drawing others to repentance, is a part we can play in hastening His coming (cf. Matt. 24:14; 28:19–20). The beauty of God's character, as described by Peter in 1:5–7, when lived out in and by the church will contrast vividly with the growing destruction and ugliness brought about by sin in this world and will lend credibility and attractiveness to the last day message of repentance before God in the face of His soon coming.

Believers look for the Lord's coming not simply out of fear or because every trace of evil—every hurt and oppression of sin—will be done away with forever (3:13). Rather, they long for the promise of a new heaven and a new earth, prophesied long ago in Isaiah 65:17. Replacing the rule of degradation and ruin caused by sin will be its opposite—the pure and loving righteousness of God.

Looking forward to dwelling in a new earth characterized by righteousness provides rich motivation to diligently seek to be found spotless, blameless, and at peace with God (2 Pet. 3:14). These descriptors are the exact opposite of those attributed to the false teachers Peter spoke of in 2:13. These had forgotten their cleansing from past sins (1:9). Believers, however, can joyfully recall their own cleansing and seek to continue to be found spotless in Him through repentance (Ps. 51:2–3; Jer. 33:8; Eph. 5:25–27; Col. 1:22; 1 John 1:7, 9). This cleansing—gifted to us by God through Christ's blood—is never separated in Scripture from a corresponding cleansing of one's heart and life. Rather, recalling God's provision (2 Pet. 1:3–4) stimulates diligence in growing the qualities of godliness (1:5–7; 3:17) in preparation for life in a realm where righteousness dwells. In this way, believers will be found at peace by Jesus at His coming, when they will find a welcome entrance into God's eternal kingdom abundantly supplied for them (1:11; cf. 1 Pet. 1:3–5).

Since many of the believers to whom Peter wrote were likely brought to Christ by Paul, Peter notes that Paul too had written of Jesus's coming, His salvation, and the place of godly living in the life of the believer (Rom. 2:1–11; Gal. 5:19–25; 1 Thess. 4:15–18). The acknowledgment that some of Paul's writings were hard to understand—even at that time—suggests that Peter knew of some distortions (likely by the false teachers) of Paul's teaching. These teachers may have falsely supported their claims to liberty by misusing Paul's teaching on salvation by faith alone (e.g., Rom. 3:28; Gal. 2:16). Peter refers to Paul's writings as Scripture, meaning they were recognized even at this point as inspired by God and authoritative for believers, a claim that Paul himself also made (e.g., 1 Cor. 11:23; Gal. 1:8–12; Eph. 3:3).

3:17–18

Letter Conclusion

In the final verses, Peter condenses the two main concerns of the letter. The basis on which he argues for each of them is the knowledge of the certainty of Jesus's coming, with its moments of terrible judgment that will ultimately usher in a perfect and everlasting new world. He first speaks of the defensive task, discussed in chapters 2 and 3a, of being vigilant against falling for error (3:17), such as that evidenced in the behavior of the false teachers and scoffers. The word athesmos (here and in 2:7 of the residents of Sodom) refers to people in abandonment of all moral restraint. Peter's second and fundamental concern is the one with which he began the letter: the positive privilege of Christian growth. As in 1:8–11, he emphasizes the ongoing nature of this growth. Turning from his recent emphasis on the human response of diligence toward growth, he refers back to his original point in 1:2–4: it is in the grace ("undeserved favor") and personal knowing (gnosis) of Jesus Christ that ongoing growth and escape from this world's corruption is possible. No wonder Peter ends with praise to God in a doxology (v. 18), referring to the wonderful hope of glorifying God throughout eternity.

1 JOHN

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The earliest extant Greek title of John's first letter is "of John A" (iōannou a), which occurs as a postscript in the two important fourth century manuscripts Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus. Later scribes expanded the title to make it more descriptive, resulting in titles like "John's First Epistle," "First Epistle of the Holy Apostle John," "First Epistle of the Evangelist and Apostle John," and "Catholic Epistle of the Holy Apostle John." The inclusion of "catholic" ("universal") in the last title reveals how the letter was perceived in the church. The word was attached to the letter because it is not addressed to any specific church. It is one of the General or Catholic Epistles of the NT (the epistles of Peter, John, James, and Jude), meaning that its message was generally applicable to all Christians.

Strictly speaking, 1 John is anonymous. Nowhere in the entire letter does the author introduce himself, nor does he inform us about his audience. Yet the letter was well-known by the early church fathers and from early on—with some exceptions—was commonly attributed to the Apostle John, the author of the Fourth Gospel. A comparison of the Gospel of John with 1, 2, and 3 John reveals numerous similarities in vocabulary and concepts, suggesting that the same author likely wrote them. These similarities include, among others, distinctive terminology and ideas like "light" and "darkness" (1 John 1:7–10; John 1:4–5; 3:19–21), being "born" of God (1 John 2:39; 3:9; John 1:13), "the Savior of the world" (1 John 4:14; John 4:42), and keeping His commandments (1 John 2:3; John 14:15). We also find differences, but these are largely due to their different objectives and audiences. The indirect reference in 1 John to the twelve apostles as eyewitnesses, among whom the author includes himself, also provides an argument in favor of John the apostle as author.

Date. The doctrines of the false teachers fit quite well into a situation toward the end of the first century, as does the problem in 3 John with Diotrephes, who usurped power and opposed the apostle. This would place the writing of the Johannine letters sometime in the early 90s of the first century, making these letters some of the last documents written in the NT Canon.

Backgrounds. It is difficult to establish the religious background against which John wrote. The churches to which he wrote faced theological conflicts, particularly related to the nature of Jesus. The opponents were former Christians (1 John 2:19) who, among other things, denied that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God (2:22). They apparently did not deny that the Christ had come, but they denied that He came in human flesh (4:2–3). They seemed to have rejected the real incarnation of the Christ. When we look for early Christian movements promoting ideas similar to those attacked by John, the closest is Docetism. The term Docetism comes from the Greek verb dokein ("to seem," "to have the appearance of"). Docetism taught that Christ did not have a real human body—that He was human only in appearance. Building on the platonic idea that physical matter was evil, they could not believe that God would assume a material body. His body, they reasoned, must have been a phantasm—and without a real body His suffering would also have been only apparent. Although Docetism was a phenomenon of the second century, it seems that some of its basic ideas were already present among some Christians in the time of John. The apostle realized that without a real incarnation there is no salvation and strongly argued that Jesus was unquestionably the Son of God in human flesh.

Theology and Purpose. The theology of the epistles of John is about the Father and His Son, Jesus the Christ. The doctrine of the incarnation is at the very center of this theology, seeking to instill hope and perseverance in the hearts of believers who were under attack by false teachers. The emphasis is on the work of God through His Son and on its significance for believers.

1. The Father. The concepts used by John to describe who God is were probably chosen because they carry ethical implications. Two of them are particularly important, namely, God is light (1:5) and God is love (4:8). John contrasts light and darkness and identifies God with light and His antagonist with darkness. Darkness is an existence deprived of fellowship with God and His truth (1:6) and is characterized by hatred (2:9). Such persons walk in darkness and are consequently disoriented—they lack hope in their lives (2:11). God is the only and exclusive source of light for humans, who are imprisoned in darkness. As light, He has made Himself known through the Son, the Word of life manifested and seen by the apostles (1:1–3). Light seems to refer to God as the Source of life that, through the Son, illuminates the life of believers. Therefore, to exist in the light—abiding in God—means to have fellowship with one another and to have been cleansed from all sin through God's Son (1:7). In the truly enlightened life, there is an absence of hatred and a fullness of union with others and God.

"God is love" takes us into the mystery of unmerited grace. The love of God is made known to us by the cross, where the Son of God laid down His life for us (3:16). In fact, the love of God—His very nature and character—was manifested toward us, in that God sent His Son into the world so that we would live through Him (4:9). Divine love saves and sustains by being directly connected to the concept of life. The image of light and love are brought together to clarify the significance of divine love (4:14). The nature of this love is such that it moves toward unworthy subjects and embraces them before they can embrace the Lord (4:10). Divine love manifested itself in actions that did not consider the value of its objects but that constituted the actions of divine love into God's children (3:1). This theology is applied by John to the life of the church and becomes the grounds for his exhortations.

Since God loved us and manifested that love in the magnificent death of His Son, John says, "we also ought to love one another" (4:11). Our love for God and for others is not natural to sinful human beings but is a gift of the Spirit. This love is of God; it comes from Him and is ours only when we are born of God (4:7). Therefore to love is to abide in God, and we know that we are in union with Him because He has given us the Spirit (4:12–13). But love for God also manifests itself in keeping His commandments (5:3). John gives the topic of love a particular theological twist when he states that we can know that we are loving the children of God when we love God and observe His precepts (5:2). Our love and obedience to God is evidence that we genuinely love others.

2. The Son of God. The Son of God is the means by which God's love and power are manifested to us. According to John, the very gift of life is ours through the work of the Son of God—Jesus the Messiah (the Christ; 2:22; 5:2). If we do not have the Son, we do not have the Father, because they are inseparable. John emphasizes the titles Jesus, the Messiah, and the Son of God to indicate that God indeed became human—a real human being (4:2). Without Him, eternal life would not be ours and the love of God would not have been manifested to us. We would not have passed from darkness/death to life (3:14). It is only through the sacrificial death of the incarnated Lord that we have life. John's epistle is for those who believe in the name of the Son of God, so that they can know that they have eternal life and continue to believe in the Son of God (5:13). They already believe, but they are exhorted to continue to believe that Jesus is the Son of God (4:15) and to abide in Him (2:24). Only through Him can they overcome the world and sin (3:9; 4:4; 5:4–5).

3. Love and Hope. The love of the Father and the Son also has a forward-looking dimension. God's love has been consummated in us and this gives us assurance in the final judgment and expels fear from our hearts (4:17–18). The hope of full acquittal in the judgment is solidly established by the love of God for us. This hope is firm because it is built on the work of the Father, who through the Son brought us cleansing, forgiveness of sin, new birth, the Spirit, and salvation. Without the incarnation, none of these would have been possible.

One of the motivations given for abiding in the Son is the hope of eternal life at the coming of Christ (2:28). This hope impacts and transforms the present experience of believers. They live expecting and anticipating the revelation of the Son, when they will be like Him and see Him as He is (3:2). Those in possession of this glorious hope purify themselves just as Christ is pure (3:3).

COMMENTARY

The Prologue

The opening verses of 1 John lay the foundation for the rest of the letter. In a community of believers where different ideas were being advanced about the person and work of Jesus, who should be trusted? Only those called to be His disciples—eyewitnesses of His life, death, and resurrection—were trustworthy. John establishes himself as a disciple at the outset of his letter. His testimony is based on what he saw, heard, and touched—a genuine sensory experience. Echoing the prologue of the Gospel of John, Jesus is referred to as the "Word [logos] of life" (cf. John 1:1–3, 14; 14:6).

Jesus is the Word that was "from the beginning." He is divine, and through Him God speaks to us. Jesus is also the eternal life that was seen, looked upon, heard, and touched—eternal life in human flesh. God has "come in the flesh" in Jesus Christ (1 John 4:2). The human Jesus and the divine Christ are the same person. Apart from Him there is no life, and He has granted it to those who believe in Him (5:11–13). This eternal life transforms the quality of life here and now. It is important to have a correct understanding of who Jesus is, because to know and have Him means that we already have this new and wonderful life.

The author uses two different Greek words for sight when describing the basis of his testimony about Jesus: "We have seen" (heōrakamen) and "we have looked" (etheasametha). These two verbs describe two different aspects of seeing. The first is clearly a reference to the sensory experience—he saw Jesus with his own eyes. The second, however, refers to the ability to see something beyond what the eye is able to comprehend (e.g., 4:14; John 4:35). Here, it appears to refer to the fact that John's testimony about Jesus was based not only on what he physically saw, but also on a deeper spiritual perception that saw the true nature and purpose of Jesus's life and death (1 Cor. 2:14).

First John 1:1–3 moves from "we"/"our"/ "us" to "you" and then back to "we." The "we" in vv. 1–2 refers to the eyewitnesses who had had direct contact with Jesus. Among them was the author of 1 John. He, therefore, could provide reliable information about Jesus and eternal life. The "you" is his audience. In v. 4, some manuscripts read "your joy" while others favor "our joy." Generally, scholars have preferred "our joy." While in vv. 1–3 the eyewitnesses and the audience are separated, in v. 4 they together share the same joy. In order to witness with integrity and persuasion, we must know the Lord ourselves (see Acts 19:13–16).

The last part of the prologue states the purpose of the proclamation of the Word of life. John mentions two elements: "fellowship" and "joy." He invites his audience to accept his testimony about Jesus in order to experience a twofold fellowship. Accepting Jesus means enjoying fellowship with God the Father and the Son and being added to the family of believers, the church. This understanding of fellowship militates against an individualism that seeks union with Jesus in baptism but that shows no interest at all in His church. The "joy" in v. 4 may also refer to the future appearance of our Lord. Thus, 1 John 1:1–4 may encompass the time from the preexistent Christ to His Second Coming.

Turning Away from Sin

For John, knowing that God is light is of fundamental importance as we relate to Him (v. 5) and as we face the problem of sin (vv. 6–10). John indicates that in our struggle with sin we have before the Father the Advocate Jesus Christ (2:1–2).

1:5. Character of God. How can we have fellowship with God (1:3)? First, we have to know Him. Second, we have to live in such a way that our walk reflects His character. This verse introduces the fundamental statement of the passage. God's character is described as "light." He is absolutely righteous, good, holy, perfect, and pure. In 2:9, light is associated with love. Light also points to God's absolute glory and majesty and may even describe His transcendence (see 1 Tim. 6:16). Furthermore, light is associated with life (see John 1:4) and the source is the Father and Jesus. Walking in the light (1 John 1:7) means to live a life separate from sin (1:5—2:2) and to obey and love (2:3–11). The words "no darkness at all" have an emphatic double negative in Greek, which points to God's absolute separation from sin and evil. God, by nature, is devoid of negative attributes and negative actions.

1:6–10. The Sin Problem. After reflecting on the purity of God's character, John next focuses on the attitudes and behaviors of believers. Verses 6–10 form a well-structured unit. Verses 6, 8, and 10 are negative—focusing on human sinfulness—while vv. 7 and 9 are positive statements containing divine promises. Verses 6, 8, and 10 describe the worsening self-deceptive claims of humans, and the divine evaluation becomes more and more serious:

Human Claim	Divine Evaluation
v. 6 – having fellowship with God while walking in darkness	we lie and do not act truthfully
v. 8 – having reached a sinless state	we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us
v. 10 – having never sinned	we imply that God is a liar, and His word is not in us

The first misguided claim (v. 6) refers to one of the oldest problems plaguing humanity: claiming spiritual or moral uprightness when languishing in sin or, as John describes it, while still walking in darkness. It is the description of an inconsistent life, where faith-talk is not matched by faith-walk. Right beliefs must go together with a righteous life—theology with ethics. This darkness is not only living in sin but also hating one's brother (2:9–11). Genuine fellowship with God is impossible while living in open sin and not having fellowship with His children.

Those who walk in the divine light and have "fellowship" with the church of Christ are being cleansed "from all sin" through Christ (1:7). "The blood of Jesus" stands for His sacrificial death on the cross that provides forgiveness and sanctification. John is not referring to persons coming to Christ for the first time; he has in mind believers who are in need of constant cleansing from sin. This is one of the paradoxes of the Christian walk: the closer believers draw to God, the more they feel the need for cleansing. The reference to "all sin" indicates that no sin is too grievous to be forgiven. The good news is that there is a solution to the sin problem and that it is found not in denial and false claims but in Jesus and what He has done for us.

While the problem in v. 6 was essentially a cavalier attitude toward sin, the problem identified in v. 8 is just the opposite. It is the claim to have no sin—to have reached a state of sinless perfection. Confident in their own ability or spiritual progress, people in this condition no longer realize the full extent of their ongoing need to be purified by the blood of Jesus (v. 7). In vv. 7–10, John uses "sin" in the singular and in the plural. This may suggest that he has in mind the basic sin of living alienated from God, as well as sinful acts.

Instead of claiming sinlessness, true believers acknowledge and confess their sins. In forgiving us, God is faithful to His covenant promises which include forgiveness for repentant covenant breakers (v. 9). He is also righteous, since at the cross Christ bore the penalty for human sin. This is about God's character—He is both faithful and righteous in forgiving us (cf. Rom. 3:25–26). First John 1:9 is a conditional clause that has the force of a command. We should lay our sins before God, and He will forgive us and cleanse us. This cleansing is more than just freedom from the penalty of sin; it frees us from the power of sin that seeks to reign in our lives (cf. Rom. 6:1–14). As serious as it is to claim that one has reached a state of sinlessness (1 John 1:8), it is even more serious to claim that "we have not sinned" at all (v. 10). This is a denial of the biblical testimony that all humans—except Jesus—are sinners (1 Kin. 8:46; Ps. 14:1–3; Prov. 20:9; Eccl. 7:20). This group has no need of Jesus and His substitutionary death. As a result they make God a "liar."

2:1–2. The Christian's Challenge and Comfort. John writes in support of Christians not denying the problem of sin or claiming absolute freedom from it. Sin is too costly and should never be taken lightly. He speaks kindly, calling church members "children," writing to them so that they do not sin (v. 1). This is what walking in the light means (1:7). John pleads for Christians to stay away from any sin. Yet he balances his admonition, referring to what they should do when they do sin. Christians, through human frailty, commit acts of sin—but they should not habitually sin. They constantly need someone to help give them victory over temptation and to assist them if they sin. John presents Jesus as the only One who can secure forgiveness for us. How is this done?

First, Jesus is our Advocate, speaking on our behalf with the Father." The Greek term paraklētos, used only by John, is applied to Jesus and the Holy Spirit (2:1; John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7). It designates a person called to the side of someone else for comfort and support. It may be a helper or a friend. Second, this Advocate is "Jesus Christ the righteous"; He has a righteous character and understands us. Third, our forgiveness is secure because Jesus Himself is the propitiation (or atoning sacrifice) for our sins.

The atoning sacrifice of Jesus is universal in extent because it deals with the sin of "the whole world." Salvation has been made available to everyone through Christ's atoning sacrifice. The mediation of Jesus does not mean that God must be persuaded to forgive us. It was the Father who in His great love sent His only Son to secure our salvation and to be the only means through which His grace reaches us.

Obedient and Loving Life

The contrast between light and darkness encompasses not only 1:5—2:2 but also 2:3–17. Walking in the light means avoiding sin (1:5—2:2), living a life of obedience and love (2:3–11), and renouncing the world (2:12–17). The second part of chapter 1 contains three false claims, and 1 John 2:3–11 also contains three claims—addressed by John in vv. 4, 6, and 9: the claim to know God while not keeping the commandments; the claim to know God; and the claim to be in the light while hating one's brother.

2:3–5. Knowing and Obeying God. The verb "to know" (ginōskō) appears four times in vv. 3–5. In 1 John, ginōskō designates the intimate relationship that humans may have with God. In v. 3, the perfect tense of the verb indicates that Christians came to know God, that they still know him in a personal and experiential way, and that they must grow in this knowledge. This type of knowledge is manifested in keeping the commandments. The term gnōsis ("knowledge"; related to the verb ginōskō) became a key term among heretic Christians known as Gnostics (Gnosticism). In Gnosticism, the emphasis was on mystical experiences or esoteric myths about God and self. Salvation was gained through secret knowledge, not through the death of Jesus, and there was little concern for moral behavior.

The keeping of the commandments (v. 4), however, is very important for John in this epistle, as it was for Jesus (2:3–4; 3:22, 24; 5:3; John 14:15, 21; 15:10; cf. Rev. 12:17; 14:12). The term "command[ment]" occurs in the singular (1 John 2:7–8; 3:23; 4:21) and in the plural (2:3–4; 3:22–24; 5:2–3). The singular points to love toward God and church members (4:21) and to faith in Jesus Christ (3:23). The plural includes the Decalogue. Some of them are indirectly found in 1 John:

Apostasy (2:26; 3:7)	first commandment
Murder (3:15)	sixth commandment
Lying (1:6, 8; 2:4, 20–22; 4:20)	ninth commandment
Lust (2:16)	seventh and tenth commandments

The Propitiation (Atoning Sacrifice) for Our Sins

The Greek word is hilasmos, which some Bibles translate as "propitiation," "expiation," or "atoning sacrifice." In the Greco-Roman world this term usually implies appeasing an angry God, but this pagan meaning is certainly not what John had in mind. The meaning of the word is better understood in relation to its use in the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the OT, where it occurs in connection with the removal of guilt through the sacrificial system (1 John 2:2; 4:10; see Lev. 25:9; Num. 5:8; Ps. 129:4; Ezek. 44:27; Amos 8:14). The cognate noun hilastērion is used to describe the "atonement cover" or "mercy seat"—the golden cover of the ark of the covenant, located within the Most Holy Place (cf. Heb. 9:5). The mercy seat was located between the presence of God and the Ten Commandments within the ark, and blood was sprinkled on it on the Day of Atonement. As such, the cover on the ark represented the mercy through which God related to His people.

While the terminology of hilasmos is the same as that used among the Greeks and Romans, the meaning associated with it could not be more different. In the pagan world, humans brought sacrificial offerings in an attempt to placate bad-tempered and capricious gods. But the sacrificial system in Judaism was not instituted by humans to placate an angry God; it was the means through which God removed sin from His people and dwelt among them. Moreover, as demonstrated in the NT by the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, God acted to bridge the gap caused by sin in offering His own Son as the hilasmos, the atoning sacrifice, to do away with sin and to save us. Thus, John portrays Jesus as both Sacrifice and Intercessor—the one who lived a sinless life among us, died on the cross, rose from the dead, and ascended to heaven to intercede for us.

Keeping the commandments is not a condition for knowing God but a sign that we know and love Him. Therefore, knowledge of God is not just theoretical; it leads to action. "Him" may refer to the Father or Jesus. Verse 4 states the same truth in a negative form and may refer to a false claim made by John's opponents. By arguing that they knew God while disregarding His commandments, they had become liars.

Verse 5 repeats v. 3 in general terms but replaces the term commandments with "word" and connects love for God with obedience. Keeping the word is truly knowing that we are in Him. The two phrases regarding keeping the commandments (vv. 3–4) and keeping the "word" (v. 5) are somewhat parallel. But while keeping the word includes the commandments, it may also point to other issues such as believing in the promises of God.

2:6. Walking as Jesus Walked. Abiding/remaining/living in God stresses the continuity and permanence of a close personal relationship with Him. Those who abide in Him must walk as He walked (i.e., live as He lived). How does this work? First, they have to observe in Scripture how Jesus lived. Second, they have to model their lives after Jesus's life. Third, they have to love and live for others as Jesus did. He laid down His life for others, and they should be ready to do the same (3:16). This means to follow Christ in the spiritual, social, and moral life.

2:7–8. The New Commandment. The new commandment and the old commandment (vv. 7–8) seem to refer to the same thing. The context suggests that this is about brotherly/sisterly love (v. 10). The commandment of neighborly love was already present in the OT (Lev. 19:18). Since Jesus deepened its significance through His life—and particularly in His death—love became a new commandment for the church. When John wrote his letter, Jesus's instruction about a new commandment (see John 13:34) was already well-known. Therefore, John could say that they had it from "the beginning" and that it was a word or message that they had heard. In this sense it was old. Yet in another sense this commandment is still new because it is continuously realized in the life of Jesus ("in Him"; He still loves us) and His followers ("in you"). John could then say that "the darkness (the absence of love) is passing" and that "the true light is already shining," that is, true love (see 1 John 2:8). This is an abiding characteristic of Jesus's eschatological community.

2:9–11. Loving Brothers and Sisters. This section begins and ends with a reference to hatred. John refers to some claiming to be "in the light" while hating other Christians. He identifies such persons as "in the darkness" (v. 9) and as those who walk in darkness, their sight having been "blinded" by the darkness (v. 11). In the center (v. 10), we find the true believers, who love others and who are abiding "in the light." They are not stumbling or becoming a stumbling block for others. Hate (vv. 9, 11) is contrasted with love in v. 10. John wrote about the problem of hating other believers (vv. 9, 11; 3:15; 4:20) while also knowing that Christians will be hated by society (3:13). Hating can refer to literal hate but can also mean to despise, to disregard, or to be indifferent. John has much more to say about love as indicated by the fact that the word family agapē is employed by him fifty-two times.

2:12–14. The Spiritual Status of Believers. John now deals with the new status of believers that distinguishes them from their opponents. In these three verses, John twice addresses children, fathers, and young men. By "children" he means church members in general. The "fathers" could be those older in faith and more mature, while the "young men" could refer to those younger in faith, both male and female.

John stresses three important things related to the status of believers: their sins have been forgiven, they have known Him who was from the beginning, and they have overcome the evil/wicked one. While the false teachers may have denied the existence of sin in their lives, genuine Christians do not deny their sinfulness but have accepted salvation through Jesus Christ (this is why John refers to the forgiveness coming through Christ's name; v. 12) and therefore have the assurance of forgiveness.

This is contrasted with the false teachers, who claim to know God and Jesus while having a false understanding of the divinity and humanity of the Messiah. Genuine Christians have known Him "who is from the beginning" and they know "the Father" (vv. 13–14). They came to know and continue to know Him. The phrase "from the beginning" reminds us of Jesus Christ (see 1:1). They know Father and Son. In knowing God there are intellectual, moral, spiritual, and relational aspects.

Christians have overcome and will overcome evil, including false doctrines, because they belong to Christ, believe in Him (5:5), and claim His victory (John 16:33; Rev. 3:21; 5:5). The consummation of this victory will occur at the coming of Jesus. The "word of God" (1 John 2:14) is the source of their strength. So, Christianity is about forgiveness of sins, knowing the Godhead, and victory. Forgiveness of sins and knowledge of God are characteristics of the new covenant (Jer. 31:31–34; Heb. 8:8–12).

2:15–17. Renouncing the World. This passage begins with a call to not love the world or things in the world (v. 15). In this section, the most frequently used term is "world" (kosmos). According to John, the world is in need of salvation and therefore in need of Jesus (v. 2; 4:14). The world is hostile to God and His people (3:13) and under the power of the evil one (5:19). False prophets, antichrists, and deceivers are in the world (4:1, 3). Christians are to overcome the world (5:4–5). In John's epistles, the term "world" is predominantly negative. Love for the world is discouraged and contrasted with love for the Father. In 1 John 2:15, the Greek has a phrase that can be translated "love of the Father" or "love for the Father." It can thus be understood as the love that belongs to God or our love for God. John may have had both in mind.

John associates three things with "the world": "the lust of the flesh," "the lust of the eyes," and the boastful "pride of life" (v. 16). The Greek term epithymia (often translated as "lust") can also mean desire, longing, passion, or covetousness. It is often used in a negative way. Epithymia may include idolatry, homosexuality, greed, envy, murder, strife, and deceit (Rom. 1:24). But desires can also be positive (Luke 22:15; Phil. 1:23; 1 Thess. 2:17). John had in mind evil desires or cravings.

"Flesh" may be used in a neutral or negative metaphorical way. It is in the latter sense that it is employed here (1 John 2:16). The "lust of the flesh" describes a self-centered approach to life. It includes sinful sexual desires that may lead to various types of sexual activity outside of marriage, and much more. It manifests in intemperance and in an unbalanced lifestyle. While the lust of the flesh points to problems arising from our sinful human nature, "the lust of the eyes" may point to external influences through which evil desires are aroused. By themselves, eyes are neutral—even innocent—but they can become means through which lustful looks (Gen. 39:7; Matt. 5:28), covetousness and greed (Josh. 7:21), or pride and arrogance (Is. 5:15) can access us (Is. 3:16–24). Perhaps this temptation even goes beyond visual stimuli and includes desires caused by mental images and reflections.

The boastful "pride of life" is the third problem. The term "life" (bios rather than zōē) could designate material possessions (1 John 3:17). People boast in what they have and what they do. We may trumpet our own achievements, forgetting that all we have and all we are is from God. There is no room in the Christian life for pride. Not only do those who love the world boast in their material possessions, they also exploit others and thereby upset the social order.

The hostile world with its evil desires is diametrically opposed to God (2:16). All negative attitudes and behaviors are "not from the Father." We should not love the world, because the love of the world and the love of the Father are incompatible (v. 16), and the world is impermanent, transient, and even unstable (v. 17). It is better to choose that which remains forever.

2:18–29
Rejecting Antichrists

From the very beginning, Christianity has had to wrestle with the problem of false teachings. In 1 John, the apostle turns from words of encouragement to words of warning, focusing on the presence of many antichrists intent on deceiving believers.

2:18. The Last Hour. From the very beginning of his letter John had in mind the false teachers troubling the church, but it is only toward the end of chapter 2 that he specifically mentions them. Although they had evidently left the church, they were still causing problems. Their activity convinced John that "the last hour" had come. The "last days" (Acts 2:17; Heb. 1:1–2) and the "last times" (1 Pet. 1:20) began with the incarnation, life, death, and resurrection of the Messiah. The entire period between Christ's First and Second Comings is considered the last days, although it has a last segment prior to the Second Coming called the time of the end. Since Jesus's first coming, the present evil age and the age of the kingdom of God overlap. The kingdom of God appears now as a kingdom of grace—later it will be the kingdom of glory. Although, the expression "last hour" is unique in the Bible, it may designate the "last days" of other NT authors that end at the Second Coming. In Revelation 18, John uses day and hour interchangeably (Rev. 18:8, 10, 17). On the other hand, John may have used the phrase to mean that a moment of crisis had arrived for the church similar to what is to take place at the future coming of the antichrist.

2:18–23. Antichrists and the Antidote. In Scripture, the term "antichrist(s)" is used only in 1 and 2 John. In this context the antichrists are not so much replacements of Christ but opponents of Him (see Matt. 24:24), their teachings opposing Christ and denying His divine-human nature. John foretold the eschatological antichrist (singular), also a false Christ. Does the antichrist in John refer (1) to an individual person or system opposed to Christ, (2) to a group of persons—in the sense that there are many antichrists—or (3) to both—various antichrists and the antichrist? John uses the singular once and the plural four times (1 John 2:18 [twice], 22; 4:3; 2 John 1:7). He uses his language carefully, allowing for multiple antichrists that deny the Father and the Son without rejecting the future coming of one specific antichrist. First John 4:3 talks about the spirit of the antichrist, meaning that the antichrists (human beings) reveal the spirit of the antichrist. From John's time perspective, the real antichrist was still to come (2:18).

2:20–29. The Anointing and Abiding/Remaining. True believers "have an anointing from the Holy One," who is in them, teaches them, and provides genuine truth (vv. 20, 27). John wanted to reassure believers that they, rather than the antichrists, had the truth. The reference to the anointing goes back to the statements of Jesus about the Holy Spirit (John 14:16–17; 15:26; 16:7) and to the fact that Jesus was anointed with the Holy Spirit (Acts 10:38). Therefore, it is most likely that the anointing stands for the Holy Spirit.

Here we may have a deliberate play on words because the term "Christ" in antichrist and the Greek term chrisma ("anointing") are related. Christ is the Anointed One. The antichrists may claim some sort of anointing or inspiration that gives them special knowledge, but only true believers have the anointing from "the Holy

The Antichrist(s)

John furnishes the following insights on the antichrists: (1) Although there is one specific antichrist, there are also a number of minor figures ("many") called antichrists (v. 18). (2) "They went out from us" (v. 19). The antichrists had been members of the church, but they had left the church. John also states that if these people had truly been part of the church in the fullest sense, they would have remained in it. For John, their departure meant that they had never been genuine Christians. Obviously, John did not include among the apostate group members of the church who were still wrestling with a correct understanding of Jesus or who were momentarily wavering because of false teachings. (3) The antichrists must have claimed superior knowledge, because John says that only believers "know the truth" and have the Holy Spirit (vv. 20–21).

(4) Antichrists deny that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and are thus opposed to the apostolic witness of the prologue in chapter 1. They are made "liars" by separating Jesus from the Father. But John mentions the Father and Son together four times (vv. 22–24), thus emphasizing their unity. Therefore, anyone who denies the Son does not have the Father (v. 23). The correct understanding of Jesus is crucial and determines one's relationship with God. (5) Because true Christians accept the apostolic message—rejecting theological misconceptions and errors—and remain in the Son and in the Father, they have "eternal life" (vv. 24–25). John, by implication, characterizes the secessionists as not having eternal life. Instead, they will be ashamed before Him at His coming (v. 28). Biblical doctrines are not dry and irrelevant statements that can be ignored. They affect our lives now and in the future. (6) These antichrists not practicing righteousness have not been born of Him (v. 29). For John, those who oppose Christ and His church manifest the character and attitudes of the future antichrist and are themselves antichrists.

One"—the Father or the Son (see John 6:69)—and therefore "know the truth" (1 John 2:21).

Some manuscripts read in v. 20 "all of you know," while others have "you know all things." The first option is preferable (see 3:2). Genuine Christians not only have the Holy Spirit to teach them but also do not need anyone else to do so (2:27). John's readers knew that Jesus was the Christ, who became flesh, died on the cross, rose from the dead, and saved them. John did not need to teach them again. He reminded them so that they would not be shaken by the claims of their adversaries. In other respects, there was need of further teaching.

In the confrontation with the antichrists, believers can rely on the gospel of Jesus that they have "heard from the beginning" (v. 24) and on the work of the Holy Spirit in their lives—the "anointing" received from Him that remains in them (v. 27). Furthermore, the word of God (v. 14) and the truth (2 John 1:2) abide in Christians.

The antidote to the messages of the antichrists is God's word as communicated by the Holy Spirit. It is the objective standard by which doctrines can be evaluated. The church should constantly abide by it over religious, philosophical, or scientific convictions that may oppose God's revealed will for us.

So John returns to the theme of abiding/remaining/living (menō) introduced in 2:6. The verb menō is used seven times in vv. 18–29. It is used for the secessionists who left the church (v. 19). The other references relate to true believers (vv. 24–28). They contain affirmation and exhortation, promise and challenge. While Christians abide in God and God in them, they are nonetheless called to hold on to this intimate relationship with their Lord and Savior. They have been promised "eternal life" (v. 25) and confidence "at His coming" (v. 28). The Christian hope is a strong motivation to maintain our union with Christ.

Living as Children of God

First John 2:29 is a transitional passage that introduces the topic of the new birth (cf. 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18; John 1:12–13; 3:3–8). The mention of those who are born of God (1 John 2:29) prepares the way for a discussion of the privileges and responsibilities of being children of God. The phrase "children of God" occurs three times in this passage and opens and closes it (3:1, 2, 10). Verses 4–7 and 8–10 parallel each other.

3:1. The Privilege of Being Children of God. The imperative calling us to "see" or "behold" implies reflection and understanding. John's words suggest astonishment and admiration regarding God's love toward humanity. It consists of loving unloving creatures and seeking their best. The expression of this love is manifested in calling believers "children of God."

John was especially interested in the fact that believers are God's children. The designation "children of God" designates not all humanity but only those who have experienced a spiritual birth, believed in Jesus as God's incarnate Son (John 1:12), and followed Him in a life of love and righteousness. Therefore, the antichrists are not children of God but rather children of the devil (1 John 3:10). Since the world and the heretics do not accept Jesus as the Christ and therefore do not know the Father, they do not know God's children either (3:1). When we look at the vastness of the universe and think about ourselves as insignificant creatures traveling through it on the surface of a planet, we cannot help but be utterly astonished at the magnificent love of God that has transformed us into His children.

3:2–3. Results and Responsibilities. Knowing that we are "children of God," we can anticipate a glorious future. Our deepest hope is that "we shall be like Him." Satan, Eve, and Adam sought to be like God in power but not in character (Gen. 3:5; cf. Is. 14:14; Ezek. 28:2). Christians should be like Him in loving others, in selfless service, and in exhibiting purity of thought and righteousness of action. For them the issue is character, not power. They long for Jesus's Second Coming and for a transformed existence into the likeness of His image.

First John 3:2 closes with a reference to His coming and the promise that we will see Him as He is. Who is being referred to here? "He" could be God the Father (v. 1), but the reference to Christ's appearing, or being revealed, suggests that it most probably refers to the Son (2:28). The "hope" in Christ's Second Coming is dynamic and works within the children of God, purifying them as Jesus is pure (3:3). This idea is developed in vv. 4–10. True hope leads to the purification or sanctification process, and it is based on Jesus as the supreme example.

3:4–7. Sin versus Righteousness—Part 1. The secessionists may have not only propagated false doctrines but also ignored the importance of living pure lives. They were not concerned about sinning. John lays out a general rule applicable to all humans—demonstrated by the phrases used in vv. 4 and 6 regarding (in Greek) pas ("all," or in v. 8, "the one" or "he," referring to anyone). The word for sin (hamartia) used by John conceives sin as missing the mark or falling short of a target. John states that those who continually sin in a willful way (as indicated by the present participle poiōn ["practicing" or "doing"] in the Greek; v. 4) are involved in "lawlessness." "Sin is lawlessness."

The term "lawlessness" points to opposition to God and reminds us of the "man of lawlessness" (2 Thess. 2:3), the antichrist par excellence, and of the climax of his activity just prior to the Second Coming. This lawlessness is exhibited by the antichrists when they flagrantly rebel against God and align themselves with Satan (1 John 3:8). The implicit exhortation is to stay away from sin as lawlessness.

The verb phaneroō ("to be manifested," "to appear"; v. 5) is found nine times in 1 John. In some cases it is related to the preexistence and incarnation of Jesus (1:2; 3:5, 8) or to His Second Coming (2:28; 3:2). Jesus appeared the first time to "take away our sins," thus solving the sin problem (v. 5). We are not clearly told how Jesus did it, but the context makes clear that this happened through His death on the cross (cf. 1:7; 2:2; 4:10). Jesus took care of the sins (plural), pointing to sinful actions and to the consequences of sin. His atoning sacrifice is sufficient for all. The antichrists did not comprehend and rejected the salvific value of the cross. John states that in Christ there is "no sin." Here, he stresses more than just the absolute sinlessness of Jesus during His earthly ministry. His statement implies that Christ's followers cannot expect to remain in Him while living in open sin, for there is no sin in Him.

John makes some perplexing statements about sin in vv. 6 and 9. How can these statements be reconciled with 1:6–10 and 2:1–2, where John states that claiming sinlessness is a lie and that although it is the Christian's goal not to sin, they need Jesus Christ as mediator?

We can safely assume that John did not contradict himself. Our present passage must be understood in the light of his previous discussion about sin. We can then suggest that John was talking about habitual sin, that is, willfully persistent sin. Believers may have sin that does not lead to death (5:16)—inadvertent, nonrebellious sin that is part of their nature (Lev. 4–6; 1 Kin. 8:46; Ps. 19:12–13; Prov. 20:9; Jer. 17:9; Rom. 7)—but they do not have the sin that leads to death (1 John 5:16–18). The verbs "to sin" and "to do" (sin) are participles found in the present tense pointing to continuous action. John was saying that believers cannot continuously sin willfully. They may fall in sin here and there but are opposed to sin and do not practice a life of sin. While 3:7 warns against the deception of the antichrists, it adds that true believers do what is right, just as Jesus is righteous. So, both subsections (vv. 4–7 and 8–10) end with a reference to righteousness.

3:8–10. Sin versus Righteousness—Part 2. Jesus came to take away sin and to destroy what the devil has done (v. 8). He was actively undoing whatever evil Satan had done. Therefore, there is no reason for believers to willfully practice sin. Otherwise they would be "of the devil," who has been rebellious "from the beginning" and who is the originator of sin. (On v. 9, see commentary on v. 6; the two verses should be studied together). God's "seed" can be understood as the Holy Spirit (John 3:6, 8); Jesus, who abides in the believer (John 6:56); or the word of God (James 1:18, 21; 1 Pet. 1:23–25), which they had "heard from the beginning" (1 John 2:24). One and two mean the same thing because Jesus abides in us through the Spirit. John probably had all of these ideas in mind. While 3:7 is positive, v. 10 is its negative counterpart. John points out that righteous deeds are a sign of a righteous character. True Christianity is lived in righteousness and love. The mention of "love" transitions us to the topic of the next section.

3:11–18. We Must Love Each Other. 1 John 3:11–24 can be divided into two sections. The first deals with brotherly love (vv. 11–18), and the second with confidence and keeping the commandments (vv. 19–24). These two sections are connected by a number of common words and phrases.

The passage on love begins with a call to "love one another" (v. 11; see also 2:10) and ends similarly (3:18). John does not set out to give a lexical definition of love; he simply shows what love is and is not. He uses the example of Cain, who killed his brother because he was following "the evil one" and his works were "evil" (v. 12), to show that in the same way the "world hates" and persecutes the followers of Christ (v. 13). In contrast, love among the followers of Christ evidences that they have passed over into the sphere of life (v. 14); a person who hates is a murderer and does not have life (v. 15; see Matt. 5:21–22).

The Greek word adelphos ("brother" or "sister") is used seven times in 1 John 3:11–18. It refers to church members (vv. 13, 14) and to Abel, the brother of Cain (v. 12). It is easier to claim to love all brothers and sisters in general than to actually love one of them (v. 15). The negative example of Cain is followed by a positive one (v. 16). Jesus "laid down his life for us." This is the supreme demonstration of love, but it is more than just an example. Since the Father sent His Son as an atoning sacrifice (2:2), believers have passed from death to life. This is demonstrated through their love for each other (3:14). This mutual love means, in principle, that we are willing to "lay down our lives" for our brothers and sisters (v. 16). Love shows itself in self-giving and self-sacrifice. It also means to forgive and not to allow past mistakes and sins to shape the present and the future. In Jesus's case, love meant dying to save others.

Love must manifest itself in actions (vv. 17–18). The positive example (v. 16) is followed by a negative example: Someone has their material needs fully met, sees a brother or sister in need, but refuses to help (unlike the situation among the early Christians in Acts 4:32–35). This is love with words instead of love with genuine action. Here, John is not opposed to love expressed in words. Encouraging and loving words can have a great and positive influence and can heal strained relationships at home, in the church, and at the workplace. John is opposed to a superficial expression of love (cf. James 2:15–16). God not only informed us that He loves us; He showed it through the death of His Son as our substitute. People who love much do much, because real love is dynamic.

3:19–21. Crisis of Confidence. This section seems to depict a potential crisis of confidence based on wrong self-perceptions. It is possible for believers to feel that they do not fully belong to the truth (v. 19). The term "confidence"/"confident" is used four times in 1 John, expressing the author's desire that believers be confident when they approach God in prayer (3:21–22; 5:14), in view of Christ's coming (2:28), and in regard to the final judgment (4:17). While their own hearts may—justly or unjustly—condemn believers, God can overrule the accusations of the heart; God is greater than our hearts and knows everything (v. 20). When it comes to their relationship with God, Christians should not rely on their feelings. They are to rely on God and the fact that He loves them.

The previous thought is contrasted with the heart that does not condemn—a heart that does not accuse others and that is at rest. With such a heart, believers have confidence and unrestricted fellowship with the Lord. Morbid self-condemnation should be replaced by confidence toward God, who has loved and saved us and who listens to our prayers (v. 22).

3:22–24. Love and the Commandments. Believing in Jesus, keeping God's commandments, and doing things pleasing in His estimation give Christians confidence that God hears their prayers (vv. 22–23). Following God's will allows for mutual abiding—we in God and God in us—and shows that the Holy Spirit is active in our lives (v. 24). The importance of keeping the commandments is underlined by the fact that in this short passage, "command"/"commandment" is used three times. Of course, John makes it clear that salvation is through the atoning sacrifice of Christ and not by works.

4:1–21

Living as Children of God: Love

This chapter returns to the topics of the antichrists (cf. 4:1–6; 2:18–29) and love (4:7–21).

4:1–6. Antichrists. This passage begins with an important exhortation: "Do not believe every spirit"—that is, any person who claims to have Spirit-led teachings—without testing his or her message (v. 1). We should distinguish between truth and error. The truth is that the divine Christ "has come in the flesh," that is, He became a human being. There are two contrasting statements. The first, a positive test, describes true believers as those who confess or acknowledge the incarnation and, thereby, the preexistence of Jesus Christ. For the Son of God is truly united to human flesh. The second, a negative test, is about not confessing or acknowledging Jesus. Those who have rejected the apostolic message, affirmed by the Spirit of truth (v. 6), according to which Jesus is the Christ and the incarnate Son of God, are "antichrists" (2:18).

Apparently, the false teachers claimed to be inspired. This is suggested by the use of the terms "spirits" and "false prophets" to describe them (4:1, 3). However, their erroneous views show that they were influenced by the "spirit of the antichrist" (v. 3). They possessed the traits of character and disposition of the antichrist. In contrast to the overcomers (v. 4), they did not belong to God. Their lives were oriented by "the world" and the world listened to them (v. 5). The contrast between the two groups is highlighted; the false teachers follow the world's way of thinking, while true Christians follow God's way (vv. 4–6). With respect to the doctrinal conflicts, believers were on the side of God.

4:7–10. God and Love. This subsection (1 John 4:7–16) can be divided into three segments.

God and Love (4:7–10)
We should love one another (v. 7).
Why? Because God is love (vv. 8–10).

Love and Abiding (4:11–18)
We must love one another (v. 11).
Why? Because whoever loves lives/abides in God, and God, who is love, abides in them (vv. 12–18).

Love for God and the Brothers and Sisters (4:19–21)
We love (v. 19).
Why? Because loving God and loving believers go together (vv. 20–21).

The passage begins with a call to "love one other" (v. 7); the reason provided is that love is from God. It is not natural to the human heart to love others. Therefore, the one who loves others is "born of God and knows God." One cannot claim to be a believer while not practicing love (v. 8). The deepest theological reason for loving others is that "God is love" (v. 8). We are dealing here with the very essence of God (vv. 8, 16). Not only does He love, but He is love in Himself. The false teachers had missed the heart of the matter: God is love. All His actions are expressions of His love. Christian love, with its ethical implications, has its source in the love of a God who loves undeserving sinners. True love always comes from God. Human love—which can be corrupted—must be constantly refreshed by leaning on God.

The question of how we know that God loves us is immediately answered: look at the cross because His love for us was manifested in the atoning sacrifice of His Son "for our sins" (vv. 9–10). While in chapter 3 the emphasis is on the Son, who laid down His life, here the emphasis is on the Father, who sent His Son into the world. This is emphasized three times (vv. 9, 10, 14). Why did the Father send His Son into the world? John provides three answers: so that we may live through Him (v. 9); so that Jesus could be the atoning sacrifice for our sins (v. 10); and so that He could be our Savior (v. 14). This is a matter of life or death.

4:11–18. Love and Abiding. This section again begins with an appeal: "We also ought to love one another" (v. 11). To "love one another" means that God dwells in us and that His love has been perfected or completed in us—it has achieved its goal (v. 12). As God's love was manifested in the life and death of Jesus, it now aims to be manifested in the lives of believers. To love means to enjoy an intimate relationship with God and to walk in the light. Abiding is a reciprocal experience: we live in Him, and He in us (vv. 13, 15, 16). This experience has been possible because God has given us His Spirit (v. 13). Together with love among believers, the Spirit is a sign that God abides in us (v. 12). It is the Holy Spirit and the apostolic proclamation—"we have seen and testify"—that allow believers first, to understand God's plan of salvation (v. 14); second, to confess what the opponents have denied, "that Jesus is the Son of God" (v. 15); and third, to know God and to accept with trust the love that God has for us (v. 16). Love, faith, and abiding in and knowing God are interrelated in this passage and summarized in v. 16.

John emphasizes that love has been perfected or made complete "among us" (v. 17). We cannot love God and at the same time flee from Him in fear. Those who live in God must have confidence/boldness on the day of judgment; we must be free from fear of torment/punishment. Love and fear are incompatible; "perfect love" expels fear (v. 18).

4:19–21. Love for God and Others. The third section begins with a statement or confession: we love (v. 19). This phrase should be read without an object (such as Him). It is a general statement, followed by the reason we are able to love. It is because of God, who took the initiative to love those who are unworthy of being loved. A person cannot claim to love the invisible God while at the same time not loving his brother or sister, who is visible. Such a person is a "liar." While the previous two subsections began with a call to love, the last subsections end with an indirect appeal: the one who loves God must love his brother or sister also (v. 21). Love for others and love for God are here summarized in a single command from God.

5:1–12

Living as Children of God: Keeping Faith

John returns to the question of true believers, indirectly contrasting them with false teachers (vv. 1–5). He will also discuss once more the identity of the Son of God (vv. 5–8), the testimony of God and Jesus in the controversy (vv. 9–10), and the practical results of believing in Jesus (vv. 11–12). The way we think about Jesus dramatically influences how we relate to God, understand the plan of salvation, and have assurance of salvation. In this section the topic of love is present, but the emphasis is on faith and on the christological titles "Son of God" (vv. 5, 10, 12), "His [God's] Son" (vv. 9–11), and "the Son" (v. 12). These designations are of special importance because they were being challenged by the antichrists.

5:1–5. Overcoming by Believing in Christ. This section begins and ends with references to believing in Jesus as the Christ (v. 1) and as the Son of God (v. 5). Obviously, these titles were questioned by the antichrists. John is precisely affirming believers in the conviction that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. Whoever accepts this truth and exhibits true love is "born of God."

John also adds to this by saying that all who love God—those who are born of Him (in this case the child is not Jesus but the believer)—will love their fellow believers, who have also been born of God. We can know that we "love the children of God" only "by loving God" and obeying Him (vv. 2–3). Our relationship with God determines the nature and the possibility of loving others. John has indicated that it is impossible to love God without loving fellow believers (4:20–21), but here we find the other side of the coin, namely, that it is impossible to love the children of God without loving God (5:2). They go together. Keeping God's commandments is also an act of love. Love is not only an emotional response but also an action ruled by principles.

The last two verses of the first paragraph (vv. 4–5) focus on overcoming or conquering the world. In order to conquer the world, one must be "born of God" and have faith. The new birth is a supernatural event by which a person joins the family of God and is no longer under the power of the world. The foundational content of the faith is the deep and personal conviction that "Jesus is the Son of God."

The battle that Christians have to fight is a spiritual battle. Nowhere in Scripture are Christians called to set out as crusaders and convert others by force. The NT does not equate a nation to be defended or expanded through violence with the kingdom of God. In the Johannine literature, the way to overcome is not by the use of violence but by faith exhibited in acts of love. The conqueror par excellence is Jesus Christ, and His victory is ours. John says that believers are to overcome indifference toward others, aversion to God's commandments, immoral pressures from our sinful nature and from society, heresy, and trials such as persecution.

5:6–8. The Jesus in Whom We Believe. John shows his audience who this Son of God is by calling to the stand three witnesses. He states that the Son of God "came by water and blood," probably referring to Jesus's baptism and death (1:6). In John's Gospel, water is associated with baptism (John 1:26, 31, 33; 3:5, 23), and this seems to be the case in 1 John. Jesus came as the incarnate Lord and began His public ministry by being baptized with water. His ministry reached its climax when He shed His blood on the cross. The first two witnesses—baptism and crucifixion—revealed who Jesus is. In both cases we find a divine manifestation and human reactions testifying to Jesus as indeed the Son of God (Matt. 3:17; 27:50–54).

The false teachers did not deny that the man Jesus was baptized and died, but they did not assign salvific importance to these events, because Jesus was neither the Messiah nor the Son of God. If the Son of God left the human Jesus before His crucifixion, then the atoning death of the Son of God was not necessary for our salvation. Salvation would be through "knowledge" (gnōsis; the secret teachings of the false teachers) and not through the cross. The third witness—after water and blood—is the Holy "Spirit," who "is truth." The activity of the Holy Spirit is described in the present tense—most likely pointing to His ongoing ministry as He testifies about Jesus. He does this through Scripture and through the inward experience of believers.

In 1 John 5:8, the three witnesses of v. 6 are repeated in almost reverse order. The Holy Spirit comes first, followed by water and blood. These three witnesses agree with each other. In the OT, two to three witnesses were required to confirm a matter (Deut. 19:15). John makes it clear that the case for Jesus has a sound foundation.

5:9–10. Jesus and the Testimony of God. God also testifies on behalf of His Son, and the testimony or witness of God is greater than human testimony or witness (v. 9). How does God testify for His Son? The threefold testimony mentioned in vv. 6–8 is at the same time God's testimony. Through them, He speaks to us about who the Son is. People are usually willing to accept the testimony of others. We often take at face value what others tell us. We are willing to believe.

How much more should we accept God's own witness and believe in Jesus as portrayed in the NT? God is reliable and true (v. 20). If we do not accept His testimony, we are implying that He is "a liar" (v. 10) and will stand condemned before Him.

5:11–12. The Result of Believing in Jesus. God has provided eternal life for humanity, available "in His Son." We receive it by accepting God's testimony about His Son—in other words, by believing in Jesus. John's discussion of the importance of faith in Jesus, of belief in who Jesus is, and of the need to accept God's testimony has a practical goal, namely, that we find eternal life in the Son of God. John's opponents, who were questioning the true divinity of Christ or the true humanity of Christ or who were having problems accepting Jesus as the Messiah and the Son of God, were proclaiming a different Jesus. Since they did not have the Jesus of Scripture, they did not have eternal life. Even if they claimed to possess eternal life and to have "superior knowledge," their claims were not true. John clearly states that those who do not have the Son of God do not have life, while those who have the Son have life (v. 12). Eternal life does not mean that a part of us survives at death (John 6:54). It is already a present reality. True believers enjoy a new quality of life here and now (John 10:10) and live with the assurance that at Jesus's Second Coming they will be resurrected.

5:13–21
Epilogue: Confidence

The conclusion of 1 John again stresses confidence—this time concerning the assurance of eternal life, prayers being answered, and three affirmations: perseverance, being children of God, and knowing God. This section corresponds to the beginning of the letter. In both passages the issue is Christology, and Jesus is called God the Father's Son Jesus Christ (1:3; 5:20), probably to refute the "antichrists." In both passages the important problem of sin is addressed (1:7—2:2; 5:16–18). And in both passages we find the concept of life (1:1–2; 5:13, 16, 20).

5:13–17. Eternal Life and Prayer. The topic of eternal life is further developed and justifies the writing of the letter. John wanted his audience to know that they already had eternal life and that to receive it they needed to believe in Jesus as the Son of God. God wants us to have assurance of salvation. Such an assurance leads to confidence with regard to our prayers; if we ask anything according to God's will, He hears us (v. 14). At the same time, we have confidence that we have already received what we had been praying for. Since we do not fully and clearly know God's will for us in every situation, we present our petitions to Him in submission to His will. In many cases, God's will is clearly expressed in Scripture.

1 John 5:7—A Textual Addition

Verse 7 is very short but contains an expansion, called the Johannine comma, which was added centuries after the NT canon was in place. Instead of reading, "for there are three that testify" and then continuing with v. 8, where the three witnesses are mentioned again, the verse was enlarged to read (as in the NKJV): "For there are three that bear witness in heaven: the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit; and these three are one." By referring to the three heavenly witnesses in v. 7, the three witnesses of v. 8 lacked an introduction. So another insertion was necessary: "And there are three that bear witness on earth." Consequently, the amplified text contains three heavenly witnesses—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—and three earthly witnesses: the Spirit, the water, and the blood.

The additions are not found in any Greek manuscript older than the fourteenth century A.D., nor are they quoted by the early Greek Fathers, although they would have helped during the Trinitarian controversies. The additions are not needed, because the divinity of Jesus and the concept of the plurality in the Godhead are strongly established in the Johannine literature (e.g., John 1:1–3, 14; 8:58–59; 10:30–31; 20:28; Rev. 5:8–14). First John 5:1–12 is not about the Trinity but about faith in Jesus as the Son of God. What disturbs most is the tampering with the biblical text, against which we are warned (Rev. 22:18–19). Fortunately, the Johannine addition is an exception rather than the rule.

If we confess our sins and ask for forgiveness, God does not put us on a waiting list; we have confidence that as we end our prayer, forgiveness of sins has been granted. If we ask him to make us His children because we accept Jesus as Savior and Lord, God will answer such a prayer right away. Whenever the will of God is revealed in Scripture—whether in a commandment or a promise—and we claim that expression of His will, we know that we "have" (present tense) an affirmative answer. Prayers in accordance to God's will are answered while we are still praying.

If we have any need that is covered by God's commands or promises—freedom from worries (1 Pet. 5:7), the gift of the Holy Spirit (Luke 11:13), wisdom (James 1:5), love for enemies (Matt. 5:44)—we may turn to God, ask Him for what we need, refer to His promise (1 John 5:14–15), and thank Him for answering our prayer. We do not rely on our feelings but trust in Him (Rom. 1:17; Heb. 11:6; cf. SC 51).

John turns to intercessory prayer (1 John 5:16–17). These verses do encourage us not only to be confident when interceding for others but also to be concerned about the spiritual welfare of our Christian brothers and sisters and to pray more consistently and earnestly for them.

5:18–19. Confident of Being Protected. The phrase about knowing is used three times in 5:18–20. Each verse begins with this very statement. However, the passage is not primarily concerned about knowledge of facts. This is the knowledge that is expressed in confidence in the Lord in spite of challenges. A true believer, "born of God," does not keep on sinning. There are different readings of the verse: one uses the reflexive pronoun "himself" ("he who has been born of God keeps himself"), and one uses the personal pronoun "him" ("He who has been born of God keeps him"). In the first case, the person that is born again keeps himself/herself from sinning. In the second case it is Jesus who keeps the believers from sinning. This is a promise that we are in Jesus's hands and that He will take care of us if we remain in Him. The second reading fits the context and John's theology better. In this case the one "born of God" in the first line describes the believer (see 3:9). The verb occurs in the perfect tense and may describe the lasting effect of our regeneration. The second phrase, "born of God," describes Christ and occurs in the past tense, which may be referring to Christ's incarnation. The usage of the same term for Jesus and His disciples may point to the fact that Jesus became one of us, although He is still different from us—He is the Son of God.

Deadly and Not Deadly Sin

The meaning of John 5:16–17 has been a matter of discussion. Certain observations could help us to understand what John had in mind. (1) John's focus is on intercessory prayer for brothers and sisters who are sinning (v. 16). The main concern is willingness to help others. Instead of spreading rumors, we are called to pray for each other. (2) A sin that leads to death is mentioned in passing and is not the main topic. The death mentioned here could be spiritual death, and it could mean "tending in the direction of/leading to spiritual death." This could result in eternal death. (3) All unrighteousness is sin and should not be justified or tolerated (v. 17). In the end, all sin leads to death (Rom. 6:23). (4) John does not prohibit praying for those who have committed the sin that leads to death. He seems to be saying that the efficacy of such prayers is limited by the will and condition of the sinner. (5) In v. 16, life is connected to prayer.

We do not know precisely what John had in mind when making the distinctions in vv. 16 and 17. Among the different attempts to understand the passage, the following two interpretations seem to be the most probable. (1) The sin that leads to death is the unpardonable sin that Jesus talked about: the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:31–32). It is a persistent sin, not a single act of sin—a habitual sin characterized by the total rejection of the call of the Spirit to repentance. (2) The sin that leads to death is apostasy. The false teachers had completely rejected Jesus by not accepting Him as Christ and Son of God. They had also separated themselves from the church (cf. Heb. 6:4–6).

The second option is favored by many expositors. But John may have had both ideas in mind; the two options are not significantly different. Some church members may have been tempted to accept the teachings of the antichrists, and John was warning them. Church members should pray for each other so that they do not reject Jesus Christ. However, if sinners repent and return to God, their sin will be forgiven (1 John 1:7, 9). Sin does not inexorably lead to death. We should pray for others, even in the case of apostasy.

John then refers to God ensuring that "the evil one" is prevented from doing permanent harm (v. 18). This promise is applicable only as long as we abide with God. The "evil one" may refer to an evil power instead of to an evil person (v. 19), but since in v. 18 the evil one refers to Satan, it is evident that it also points to him here. This is a brief glimpse of the Great Controversy between Christ and Satan. The "world" is the arena of the evil one, but true believers can be confident because they belong to God and are protected by Jesus. Consequently, they are able to say no to sin and to withstand temptations.

5:20–21. Knowledge of the Godhead. For a third time John states "we know" (v. 20). "The Son of God," Jesus, has come into this world and has revealed God the Father to us. This knowledge not only is superior to the "knowledge" of the secessionists but also leads to a close connection with God. Believers are in God, that is, in union with Him. Although "the true God" may be a reference to the Father, it most probably refers to the Son (v. 20). Throughout his first letter, John switches easily from the Father to Jesus. In some cases, the third person personal pronouns may even refer to both Father and Son. John uses the word "true" three times in 5:20. The first reference may point to God the Father. The second reference may refer to Jesus—God's Son Jesus Christ. The last part of this clause seems to explain the first: The Son of God is the one who is true. The last reference occurs in the last sentence: "He [or "This"] is the true God and eternal life."

Until this point, John has not mentioned idols (v. 21) and idolatry in his letter. Instead, he has wrestled with false ideas about Jesus and their influence on still-faithful church members. Why would he introduce a topic at the very end of his letter that had not been discussed before? Obviously, John considered false views of Christ to be idolatry. As the sin leading to death is a rejection of Jesus as Son of God, so idolatry is associated with the antichrists' teachings about God and Jesus. Their understanding of the Godhead is an idol.

John finishes his first letter on a very positive note. Although he warns against false teachings and the resultant lifestyle, he uses the last paragraph of his epistle to call us to confidence. Christians do not need to live in fear, uncertainty, and doubt. On the contrary, God wants us to enjoy confidence regarding our relationship with Him. When we have the Son of God, we have assurance of salvation, confidence that our prayers are answered, and certainty about our connection to God. This certainty is nurtured by the hope that we will see Him again (3:2–3).

Jesus as God

The "true God" of whom John speaks in 5:20 is Jesus. The closest antecedent of the pronoun "He" is Jesus Christ. Although "true" is an attribute of the Father (John 7:28; 17:3), it is more frequently used to describe Jesus (see also 1 John 2:8; John 1:9; 6:32; 15:1; Rev. 3:7, 14). In the Johannine writings, Jesus is without question God. This true God is "eternal life." Life is again and again associated with Christ (e.g., 1 John 5:12; John 1:4; 11:25; 14:6). According to 1 John 1:1–2, Jesus is the Word of Life, the life, and the eternal life. By calling Jesus the "eternal life" in the beginning and the end of 1 John, the apostle opens and closes his letter with an important topic. Since John is dealing with antichrists challenging the divinity of Jesus, it would be most appropriate to affirm His deity at the end of the letter. The Gospel of John begins and ends by calling Jesus God (John 1:2; 20:28). The same approach seems to be used in 1 John (1:1–3; 5:20). They both climax in the declaration that Jesus is God and that eternal life is found only in Him.

2 JOHN

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. This commentary holds that John the apostle was the author of this letter. (For the arguments supporting this view, see 1 John: Introduction.) Essentially the same range of titles discussed in relation to 1 John also applies to this letter; the only difference is that it is identified as the second letter (see 1 John: Introduction).

Date. This letter was written late in the first century A.D., likely after 1 John. (For more, see 1 John: Introduction.)

Backgrounds. John's second letter resembles 1 John in many respects. Although it is much shorter it uses to a large extent the same vocabulary. We also find the same themes and concerns. There is, however, a more personal touch as John lovingly encourages his church members. Unlike the earlier epistle, this one is clearly a letter with a formal introduction and conclusion. The main body of the letter contains praises, exhortations to love and to walk according to the commandments, and a section dealing with the antichrists. But 2 John does not simply repeat the same subjects of 1 John as a letter intended to be circulated among believers. It is also more straightforward than 1 John. At the end of the letter, the elder expresses his wish to see his audience soon.

Theology and Purpose. See 1 John: Introduction.

1–3
Greetings

The apostle, as an elder, addresses the elect (chosen) lady and her children. At the very end of the epistle, her sister's children are mentioned (v. 13). The term used for "lady" is the female form of the term "lord." The elect lady has been understood as (1) an unnamed woman, either a lady called Electa; Mary, the mother of Jesus; or Martha, which in Aramaic stands for "lady," or (2) a metaphor for the church. In the first case, the lady, her children, and her sister would have to be understood literally. In the second case, she would represent a church and its members. A cursory reading of 2 John suggests that the letter is addressed to a group of believers. A statement similar to 2 John 1:1 is found in 1 Peter 5:13, which seems to refer to a local church. Other places in the NT also portray the church as a woman (e.g., Eph. 5:22–32; Rev. 12:1–6).

John says the elder loves the church. But to understand the nature of true love among Christians, a qualifier is needed, namely, truth (2 John 2). Christian love is love expressed in the context of truth. The emphasis on love and truth indicates that John's churches were facing a crisis of both. It almost seems as if "truth" is personified. Truth abides in us and will be with us forever. Truth reminds us of Jesus, who is the Truth (John 14:6). The Holy Spirit and truth will be with believers forever (2 John 2; John 14:16). Both truth and love ultimately point back to God and belong together in the Christian faith and experience. They form the main theme of 2 John. Truth is needed to discern deceptions and their results (vv. 7–8) and to abide in the teaching of Christ (vv. 9–10).

The salutation is in fact a promise or affirmation—not a mere wish. Grace, mercy, and peace come from both God the Father and Jesus. The Father and the Son are placed on the same level. This statement prepares the way for a similar association in v. 9 and for the discussion of the problem with the antichrists (v. 7), who deny the divinity of Jesus and the true humanity of Christ. The Godhead's revelation and blessings are closely associated with truth and love and should be prominent in the messianic community. The truth is that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. The combination of truth and love indicates that truth must be expressed in love and that love must be grounded in truth.

Walking According to the Commandments

It is encouraging for church members to know that their spiritual leader has rejoiced greatly because they are walking in the truth (v. 4). It motivates them to continue their Christian life in truth, as they receive a command from the Father. But although John rejoiced that some of the children were walking in truth, his statement implies that some were not—perhaps due to the problems addressed in his earlier letter.

After the rejoicing comes a request and exhortation (vv. 5–6): love one another. John moves from the concept of commandment to the concept of love because the content of the commandment is love. In the context of falsehood and schism, love must be strengthened and intensified. To love is to keep the commandments (v. 6). Love is not merely what we feel; love is what we do, how we act, and how we relate to others. John talks about walking in truth (v. 4), walking in obedience to His commands (pl.), and walking in "it." (sing.; v. 6). The closest antecedent of the pronoun "it" is the command referring to mutual love. To walk in the truth means to live a genuine life committed to God and His truth as revealed in Jesus Christ. It also means walking in love—keeping the commandment to love each other. Love is the foundational element of walking in all of God's commandments. Obedience to the law is not opposed to the gospel; salvation does not depend on works. Truth, love, and obedience to the commandments had been partially lacking in the Johannine community and needed to be recovered.

Warning against Deceivers

John addresses the problem of the deceivers and their false understanding of Jesus. The situation is similar to what we encountered in 1 John. They promoted a radically different understanding of Jesus, and many had left the church and become deceivers themselves. Of course, many were still walking in the truth (v. 4), and John wanted to affirm them.

The false teachers are described as many, those who do not acknowledge (or confess) that Jesus Christ is coming in the flesh, those who have left the church and have gone out into the world, and "antichrist" (v. 7). At first the singular is used to refer to them, then the plural, and finally the singular "antichrist" is employed. Obviously, the deceivers prefigure the future antichrist (see 2 Thess. 2; Rev. 13). While 1 John 4:2 notes that "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh," 2 John 7 remarks that Jesus Christ is coming in the flesh, employing the present tense. This coming of Jesus could be referring to His Second Coming but most probably designates His incarnation "in the flesh." The incarnation happened once, but its results remain. Jesus Christ became flesh/human and remains human (continual present tense).

John counseled church members to watch out constantly to avoid being deceived and thus losing their complete reward (v. 8). Some Greek manuscripts refer to what "you" have worked for instead of "we" have worked for. "We" is preferred by the majority of English translations and the Greek text. The full reward may refer to the reward of eternal life (1 John 5:11–12). A wrong understanding of Jesus means losing eternal life. But those not following the heretics would receive a free gift from God.

John says whoever joins the secessionists has run ahead and goes too far/transgresses (2 John 9). Such persons may have considered themselves enlightened, but in reality they were separated from God. While John supported a better understanding of biblical truth, he opposed any misrepresentation of the person and work of Christ. Teaching (doctrine), mentioned twice in v. 9, may designate instruction given by a teacher or the content of what has been taught. In this passage, the challenge is to the apostolic teaching about Jesus. Whoever accepts this biblical teaching and faithfully remains in it has both the Father and the Son. Falsehood brings one's relationship with God to an end. John was convinced that doctrine matters. Apostasy usually begins with minor deviations from the truth before it is clearly identified as such. John warns us to watch out and not to go beyond the teachings of Jesus and the apostles.

The apostle alerted believers against any false teacher: do not receive him into your house nor welcome him (v. 10). In the Bible, hospitality is a great virtue (e.g., Heb. 13:2; 1 Pet. 4:9). But if hospitality leads to the support of false teachers, it should not be practiced. In the first century A.D., teachers traveled around preaching in various places and staying with church members, who provided food and lodging to them. If such teachers were propagating false doctrines, Christians were not expected to receive them in their homes.

The last phrase of v. 10, repeated in the beginning of v. 11, has been rendered "not to give him a greeting" (NASB, ESV) or "to greet him" (NKJV), while others use "not to welcome him" (NIV) or "not to bid him God speed" (KJV). Although "to greet" is a correct translation, the issue is not about saying hello but about welcoming and supporting the teachers in their actions. John is not suggesting hating or completely avoiding contact with persons who think differently. But Christians must be aware that certain behavior could be understood as an endorsement of ideas opposed to the truth.

Heresies can be very damaging to the church and its message. We should not be indifferent to biblical truth and consider any opposition to heresy to be judgmental or arrogant. Uncontrolled tolerance could lead to compromise, and compromise leads to heresy. No church is immune to such developments. John reminds us that there is a basic difference between truth and error, that what we believe matters, and that our beliefs affect our relationship with God.

Farewell

Verses 12 and 13 constitute the conclusion of the letter. John refers to the lady's sister (v. 13). The concept of joy (v. 4) is repeated in v. 12. The author wanted his congregations to experience complete joy. The conclusion of 2 John shows John's personal interest in his audience and his desire to meet with them personally—to reaffirm and warn them. Open and tactful communication is normally better than assuming that issues will disappear by themselves. It is better to solve a problem than to ignore it, and it is better to encourage each other than to never say an affirmative word. The message of John's letters is quite strong. When it came to antichrists, John left no room for negotiation or compromise. It was his duty to protect the church and its members.

John's second letter shows his concern for his church and his longing for all members to be strong in their faith. He encouraged, exhorted, and cautioned them—stressing truth and love. In our Christian life we must walk in the truth, in love, and in God's commandments. Then, instead of being deceived, we will be able to help others. As we approach the realization of the Christian hope, the message of 2 John is very relevant—calling us to be vigilant in love against deception.

3 JOHN

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. As noted in regard to 1 and 2 John, this commentary holds that John the apostle is the author. Also, the same range of titles discussed in relation to 1 John also applies to this letter, the only difference being that this is his third letter (see 1 John: Introduction).

Date. This letter was written late in the first century A.D., likely after 2 John. (For more, see 1 John: Introduction.)

Backgrounds. While 1 and 2 John deal primarily with Christ, who had been misrepresented by false teachers, 3 John wrestles with a leadership crisis in a local church. On one side were the Apostle John (the elder), Gaius, and Demetrius; and on the other side was Diotrephes, who was attempting to establish his supremacy. The apostle was writing to provide guidance to the church on how to deal with this situation.

Theology and Purpose. History is filled with the record of individuals who sought power by exploiting, enslaving, and killing thousands—even millions—of innocent people. The cosmic conflict itself began with a power struggle in heaven. This conflict manifested itself in the life of the Christian church. At the end of the first century A.D., most of the eyewitnesses to Jesus—including most of the twelve apostles—had passed away. New leaders had to take over, resulting in some difficulties. In 3 John the problem in the church was not primarily doctrinal but administrative—one of personal ambition and possibly an attempt to change the way churches were governed. In the long run, this situation could also impact the message of the church. Similar attempts to occupy positions of power—including well-intended ones—led to the establishment of the monarchical episcopate in the second century A.D.—that is, the consolidation of power in one person, called the bishop, who presided over all the activities of the church in a geographic area—instead of shared leadership among groups of elders. As a result, a strict hierarchy was created, and the church became more or less identical with the so-called clergy. This model of ecclesiastical hierarchy reached its peak in the Medieval Ages, when one person became the sole ruler over not just Christianity but to some extent kings and emperors.

The study of 3 John should lead us to think about the nature of Christian leadership. According to the NT, all believers are part of the royal priesthood (1 Pet. 2:9; Rev. 1:5–6) and all have received spiritual gifts necessary for the church (1 Cor. 12:7, 27–31). A distinction between laity and clergy is foreign to the NT. God has called some persons to leadership positions in the church (1 Tim. 3:1–7), and they should be respected (Heb. 13:7, 17). But church leaders are not infallible and should not pretend to be so. In some cases, there may even be justified reasons for complaints (1 Tim. 5:19), but these should be presented carefully and lovingly. Leaders must indeed lead out, be shepherds, and most of all be examples for the rest of the body of Christ. They must equip church members to perform the ministry to which they are called (Eph. 4:11–12). John was writing against conflicts of leadership in the church because of their threat to the unity of the church and their damage to its message. The epistle discusses and evaluates a positive character—Gaius (vv. 1–8); a negative character—Diotrephes (vv. 9–10); and another positive character—Demetrius (vv. 11–12).

COMMENTARY

The Elder and Gaius

The Apostle John introduces himself as "elder" (v. 1), although his ministry surpassed the local level. There are a number of possible reasons for the use of this title: (1) it may refer to John's position, age, or both; (2) John may have been indicating that the letter was an official communication; (3) the title may point to the respect and authority due to its holder; (4) other apostles used the title (1 Pet. 5:1), and John may have been following this practice; and (5) the use of "elder" may point to John's humility and collegiality, which differs widely from the attitude of Diotrephes.

Third John is one of the few letters in the NT addressed to an individual. It is an extremely important witness of what was taking place in the early church toward the end of the first century. The conflict we see here became more pronounced in the subsequent centuries. It also contains important lessons for the Christian faith today.

John wrote the letter to Gaius (v. 1). Since Gaius was a common Roman name, we do not know if this individual is the Gaius of Macedonia (Acts 19:29), of Derbe (Acts 20:4), of Corinth (Rom. 16:23), or some other Gaius. He might have been a Gentile Christian who was wealthy enough to support and accommodate traveling missionaries. Or perhaps he was an important and well-respected person in the local church, although he probably was not the main leader. The fact that John was writing to someone other than the head elder of the church may indicate strained relations.

Four times John calls Gaius his beloved friend (vv. 1, 2, 5, 11), suggesting he had a very good relationship with him. The emphasis on love (vv. 1, 6) and truth (vv. 1, 3, 4, 8, 12) is common in the Johannine Epistles. There is also an important stress on ethical behavior. It is connected to the idea of walking in the truth (vv. 3–4). Gaius was doing well spiritually, but his physical health may have been wanting (v. 2). John wished and prayed that Gaius would be healthy in all aspects of his being. Today, we know that our emotional, mental, and spiritual dimensions are interconnected. Physical sickness can lead to depression and to questions or doubts about the Lord's goodness. If one aspect of our personality suffers, the others are also affected. The desire for physical health and wholeness requires that we take personal responsibility for our well-being. The passage does not support a "prosperity gospel," however, according to which God's children will always enjoy health and abundance of wealth. John rejoiced that Gaius was walking in the truth (vv. 3–4), practicing the Christian message, and that fellow believers praised his wonderful Christian life. For his part, John longed to see Gaius soon and to talk to him personally (v. 14).

Gaius's Ministry to the Church

In his second letter, John had addressed the issue of hospitality and warned against being hospitable to traveling missionaries who were teaching heresies. In 3 John, the apostle comes back to the issue of hospitality. He praised Gaius for being faithful in his service for the brothers and sisters, especially strangers. The apostle encouraged him to continue extending hospitality to true itinerant missionaries (vv. 5–6). John criticized Diotrephes for refusing to receive these servants of the Lord, building his own power basis instead (vv. 9–10).

The traveling missionaries needed help (vv. 5–6, 8). They were doing God's work by going out to spread the message for His name's sake, taking nothing from the pagan Gentiles (v. 7), preaching the gospel for free but needing food, lodging, and support to continue their journeys. They were not, as a matter of policy, to become dependent on Gentiles, begging them for money. There are many good causes to fund, but believers are expected to support the proclamation of the gospel with tithe and offerings and to be hospitable (Rom. 12:13; Heb. 13:2; 1 Pet. 4:9). In doing this, church members become workers together for the truth (v. 8).

Diotrephes

The Greek term epidechomai ("to accept"/"receive"/"welcome"/"acknowledge") marks the beginning and end of the discussion about the unacceptable behavior of Diotrephes:

A Action of Diotrephes: not receiving/welcoming/acknowledging John and his group (v. 9)
  B Future action of John: calling attention to his deeds (v. 10a)
A' Action of Diotrephes: gossiping maliciously about John and his church; not receiving nor welcoming the believers, forbidding those who wish to, and putting them out of the church (v. 10b)

Pointing to Gaius and his ministry has prepared John to tackle the problem of Diotrephes, the leader of the church. Diotrephes was hindering hospitality and disfellowshiping church members who supported traveling missionaries (v. 10). Why was John sharing this information with Gaius? Gaius and Diotrephes were probably members of the same church, but Gaius may not have known much about the situation in the church because he might have lived far from the church and/or his poor health did not allow him to attend church regularly; or Gaius may have been fully familiar with Diotrephes's attitude. John had written a previous letter to the church (v. 9), possibly addressed to Diotrephes, who in turn may have suppressed or even destroyed it because he did not like the content and was not willing to take directives from the apostle. Now John was writing another letter—3 John, addressed to Gaius—hoping that Gaius would share it with the church. John included information that Gaius was familiar with but that was important for the church to know. He may have been letting the church know that he was working on a solution.

Obviously, the situation was rapidly deteriorating. Church members were being pushed aside or even disfellowshipped for showing basic Christian courtesy, while Diotrephes likely was trying to establish himself as the one in absolute control of the congregation. He may have confused lust for power with zeal for the gospel. Arrogantly, he rejected the authority of the Apostle John and others.

This was a dangerous development because Diotrephes wanted to act independently of those who oversaw the church, thus becoming an autocrat. Such an attitude had the potential to dramatically change the nature of the church and the role church members should play. The problem was not theology. John and Diotrephes probably agreed on Christian doctrine. The issue was power. John criticized Diotrephes for loving to put himself first, not wanting to have anything to do with the apostle and his group, bringing false charges against John using malicious words, refusing to welcome the believers, hindering those willing to care for traveling missionaries, and being ready to excommunicate those who did not support him.

Testimony about Demetrius

John encouraged Gaius to continue to follow what was good and to imitate not evil but good (v. 11). The children of God are recognized by doing/practicing what is good. It is important to follow the right examples in life and to have the right friends. Verse 11 is a transitional statement. It builds a bridge between what John had said about Diotrephes and what he was about to say about Demetrius. Diotrephes found an evil example to imitate. In the case of Gaius, Demetrius was a good model to follow (v. 12). His name indicates that he was a Gentile Christian. He supported the Apostle John and may have been one of his associates and a traveling missionary. He had a threefold testimony: from everyone, from the truth, and from John himself. John may have wanted him to be present during his future meeting with Diotrephes. He may have been the bearer of the letter. And it may have been Gaius's task to grant Demetrius hospitality.

Concluding Remarks

The conclusion of 3 John is similar to that of 2 John, perhaps indicating they were written at the same time. While some Bible translations have fifteen verses in 3 John, others have only fourteen. Some have merged verses 14 and 15 into a single verse. John knew that his letter was not sufficient. He could have written a longer letter (v. 13), but what he really wanted was to visit Gaius (v. 14). The ending of 3 John contains a greater sense of urgency than the conclusion of 2 John. John knew he must come very soon and was hoping to be able to talk to Gaius face-to-face. The wish for peace is very appropriate in this letter and refers to the need to always be at peace with God and with each other (v. 14). In the midst of all the turmoil that Gaius and those who sided with the apostle found themselves, the peace of God provided comfort, rest, trust, and hope.

John tells us that we all influence others and that this can help or hinder them. We can either be Gaius or Demetrius, who labored for the kingdom of God, or Diothrephes, who hindered God's cause. John exhorts us to follow the right model and to enjoy the peace and hope of heaven.

JUDE

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The author calls himself Jude, which is a shortened form of Judas or Judah, a very common Hebrew name with deep patriarchal and tribal roots (Matt. 1:2–3; 2:6). There are several people called Judas in the NT, the most famous of whom is Judas Iscariot (Matt. 10:4; 26:14, 25, 47; 27:3). But we also find the revolutionary Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:37); Judas of Damascus, in whose house Saul lodged (Acts 9:11); Judas called Barsabbas, a Jerusalemite prophet (Acts 15:22, 27, 32); and Judas the son of James, a disciple of Jesus (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13). The author of this letter, however, designates himself as the "brother of James" (Jude 1:1), one of the siblings of Jesus (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3)—presumably a stepbrother. Whether Jude was a full brother, a half or stepbrother, or a cousin has been debated for centuries. Some manuscripts even included an opinion on this question as part of the title (e.g., a fourteenth-century manuscript bears the title, "The Catholic [meaning "universal" or "general"; see "Introduction to the New Testament Epistles," p. 1544] Epistle of Jude, the Other Step-brother [i.e., in addition to James], to the Pious Faithful"; see "The Brothers of Jesus," p. 1252).

Jude was not a follower of Jesus during His ministry (Mark 3:21, 31) but became a believer after His resurrection (Acts 1:14). That may explain why Jude modestly refers to himself as "a servant of Jesus Christ" rather than a brother of Jesus. The "brothers of the Lord" were known in the early church, along with the apostles, as traveling missionaries (1 Cor. 9:5). Thus, the evidence from within the NT favors identifying Jude as the brother of Jesus and James.

Date. Like all the documents in the NT, the date associated with the Epistle of Jude depends on several factors. Since Jude 17 encourages the reader to remember the "apostles," some commentators conclude the letter must have been written sometime after the death of the apostles. This is unlikely, however, since the reference is to the instructions the believers received from the apostles who founded the church at the believers' conversion (vv. 3, 17). The past comprised the missionary activity of establishing the church, not the apostolic period.

A more helpful clue in determining the letter's date is the strong similarities that Jude shares with 2 Peter. Analysis suggests that Peter paraphrased the epistle of Jude. It is unlikely that Jude made use of 2 Peter, since Jude's epistle exhibits a clear structure that is absent from the second half of 2 Peter. It would have been difficult for Jude to have constructed his letter out of what Peter had written. If this is correct, the letter of Jude must have been in existence before 2 Peter was written and prior to Peter's death, which was sometime around A.D. 65. Therefore, a plausible date for Jude would be the late A.D. 50s or early 60s.

Backgrounds. It is difficult to establish the audience of the epistle of Jude. Calling them beloved friends (vv. 3, 17, 20), Jude reminded them of what the apostles had proeirēmenōn (from the verb prolegō). This could mean (and has been translated as) either something previously mentioned or something predicted (v. 17). This seems to indicate that Jude was not the founder of whichever church he was writing to. Some scholars favor a Jewish Christian audience because the author presupposes familiarity with Jewish literature and traditions. This is not decisive, however, because Jewish literature was also used in instructions for Gentiles. Therefore, a predominately but not exclusive Jewish Christian audience seems to best account for what little we know about the audience. Some scholars suggest that it was written to Christians living in Syria, but Asia Minor, with its large Jewish communities and antinomian tendencies (the churches in Pergamos and Thyatira [in Asia Minor]; cf. Rev. 2:14, 20), seems more probable.

Theology and Purpose. The purpose of the Epistle of Jude was to contend for the faith (v. 3). Originally, Jude intended to write about the common ground of their shared salvation (v. 3), but the Spirit impressed him to address the danger of false teachers. The opponents were a group of itinerant, charismatic, libertarian teachers opposed to the law. They had infiltrated the church unnoticed—ungodly people who perverted the grace of God into sensuality and who denied their Lord Jesus Christ (v. 4). These false teachers relied on dreams, rejecting authority (v. 8) and speaking evil of everything they did not understand (v. 10). Jude further describes them as complaining, judgmental, hedonistic, insincere in their false boasts and flattery designed to gain their own advantage (v. 16), and interested in financial gain, like Balaam (v. 11). Finally, Jude tells us that they lacked the Spirit (v. 19). Their ultimate fate would be revealed at the coming of Christ, when the Christian hope will be unveiled (vv. 14–15).

Although Jude is short, it does highlight some important theological themes.

1. God's Righteous Judgment. The certainty of God's judgment on evil is one of the central theological themes in Jude. Although false teachers were at work undermining the truth of the gospel message (vv. 4, 8, 10–13, 16), Jude reminded his readers that these individuals would not be successful. Certain destruction awaited them at the end of the age at the Lord's return in judgment (vv. 14–15), as had been predicated in the past (v. 4). These individuals would experience God's righteous judgment just as the rebellious Israelites (v. 5), the fallen angels (v. 6), and the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 7) did.

2. Hope. While Jude speaks of the certainty of the judgment of evildoers, he also speaks confidently of the hope that Christ's followers can have. He encouraged his readers to be firm in the faith, reminding them that the difficulties they experienced should come as no surprise, since the apostles predicted such things would occur (vv. 17–18). He urged them to recognize the time in which they lived and to not only look forward to the mercy they were to receive from Christ (v. 21) but also extend mercy to those struggling with doubt (v. 22). He then concluded his letter with one of the most encouraging words of hope in the NT—the assurance Jesus would protect His followers from falling and present them faultless before God (vv. 24–25).

Literary Features. From a literary point of view, this document is an ancient letter with all its conventional parts: an epistolary opening (vv. 1–2); the main body of the letter—which sounds more like a homily than a letter, consisting of a series of scriptural texts (vv. 5–19); an exhortation (vv. 20–23); and a doxology (vv. 24–25).

COMMENTARY

1–2

Greetings

Jude begins his letter by identifying the sender (Jude, a [bond]servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James) and the addressees (the ones who have been called and loved and belong to Jesus), and by sharing a greeting: a blessing of mercy, peace, and love (vv. 1–2). Jude refers to himself not as an apostle but as a slave of God—an honorific title (see Ex. 14:31; Josh. 1:1; Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:10; James 1:1; 2 Pet. 1:1). Unlike in other NT letters, the addressees are not identified by geographical location. This suggests that this is an encyclical letter to be read by all churches. Jude refers to the addressees as called and loved by God and admonishes his readers to keep themselves in God's love (v. 21).

The author also refers to the audience as "preserved" or "kept" in Jesus Christ. This could mean preserved for or by Jesus, but perhaps the emphasis is on the second option (see v. 24). Concluding his opening wishes, Jude shares a wish-prayer for mercy, peace, and love. The greeting varies from the typical Christian wish-prayer, which mentions "grace" (e.g., Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3; 2 Cor. 1:2; Gal. 1:3). The omission is surprising but understandable since the fundamental problem Jude addresses is a perverted understanding of grace (v. 4).

Reasons for Writing

Jude initially planned to discuss the theme of salvation (v. 3)—a reference to the messianic salvation accomplished through Jesus Christ, whose sovereignty and lordship the false teachers were denying (v. 4; cf. Acts 4:12). However, challenges facing the church prompted Jude to change the theme of his letter. Outsiders had wormed their way into the church and were promoting an altered doctrine of "grace" that lacked self-restraint and denied the authority of Christ (Jude 4). Concerned about this development, Jude exhorted the followers of Christ "to contend" for the faith: an image of athleticism drawn from competition in the games or from the context of warfare. The terminology here applies to the preservation of the apostolic faith "once for all"—delivered or entrusted to the hagiois ("to the saints" or "to God's people"; v. 3; cf. Gal. 1:9).

Jude declared that these sorts of heretics had been identified from ages past for judgment (v. 4)—a theme that is outlined in the epistle (vv. 5–7; 10–15). The writer characterizes the outcome of their teachings and lifestyle as sensual corruption (v. 4). They were denying the Lord Jesus Christ through their behavior (see Titus 1:16) and using God's grace as an excuse to justify their own lack of moral restraint.

Exodus, Angels, and Sodom and Gomorrah

As an example of the certain judgment to fall on those who perverted the gospel, Jude reminded his readers of the fate that befell three groups of evildoers: the rebellious Israelites (v. 5), the fallen angels (v. 6), and the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 7). The heretics, like the Israelites, failed because they were not faithful to God's covenant (cf. Num. 13–14). The failure of the Israelites serves as a warning: people who have experienced God's saving power are not immune from becoming lost themselves if they rebel and fall away from the truth (see Heb. 4:2; 2 Pet. 2:20; 3:17).

The second group in Jude's trio of examples of divine judgment is the fallen angels. They were privileged to live in the presence of God but did not keep their archē. This Greek term—which can denote authority or beginning—may here refer to either an office that they held or a realm they inhabited. Jude 6 and 2 Peter 2:4 mention the judgment of angels. Different interpretations have been given for this passage in Jude, but Jude was most probably thinking of the cosmic conflict alluded to in Isaiah 14:12–15 and 24:21–22. These angels were apparently not satisfied with their status. As a result, they were kept in chains and darkness—a situation of their own making—waiting for the execution of their sentence. Their end points by implication to the similar fate that awaits the apostate teachers.

The third group Jude holds up as an example of judgment is the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19), a group long regarded as the paradigm of divine judgment (Deut. 29:23; Is. 1:9; Jer. 23:14; Matt. 10:15; Luke 10:12). The cities were suffused with sexual immorality. People went after sarkos heteras (lit., "different," "other," or "strange flesh"). This has sometimes been translated as "perversion" or "unnatural desire." Many have interpreted this phrase to be a reference to the flesh of the angels, not homosexual gang-rape (see Gen. 19). However, in the story of Sodom and Gomorrah, the citizens demanded that Lot bring out "the men" to whom he showed hospitality. The citizens did not know that the men were angels. Going after sarkos heteras ("different flesh," "strange flesh," or "perversion") designates the sin of homosexual activity. These cities were destroyed by an eternal fire—"eternal" indicating that its result was irreversible. All three examples illustrate the certainty of God's judgments on evil.

Defilement, Rejection of Authority, and Blasphemy

With the term homoiōs ("likewise" or "in the same way"), Jude connects the heretics in his audience with other ancient sinners. Dreams in Scripture could convey divine revelation (e.g., Gen. 37:5; Dan. 1:17; Matt. 1:20; Acts 2:17; 18:9). These heretics, however, claimed divine revelation in support of their sensual behavior (Jude 8; cf. v. 4). Jude shared three accusations:

First, he said the heretics "defile the flesh" or "pollute their own bodies." Contextually, Jude is speaking here about the improper use of the body in sexual acts: a moral defilement (cf. vv. 4, 7, 23). In the second charge, Jude said that they rejected authority. Given that Jude had already charged the heretics with denying the Lord Jesus Christ (v. 4), their main problem seems to have been the rejection of the authority of Christ. In the final accusation in the trilogy, Jude said that they blasphēmousin (from the verb blasphēmeō; "to blaspheme," "revile," "speak evil," "abuse," or "slander") the doxas (from doxa; lit., the "glories"), a term that has been variously rendered as "dignitaries," "celestial beings," "angelic majesties," or simply "angels." What is the identity of these beings? The analogy of the heretic's behavior and that of Michael—who did not blaspheme the devil (vv. 8–9)—seems to identify the glorious ones as supernatural beings. Jude denounced the heretics for their behavior, contrasted with that of the archangel Michael.

Even Michael, when arguing a just case against the devil, did not pronounce a word of judgment against him. He deferred that matter to God, since as the Supreme Judge, judgment is God's prerogative alone. The biblical background for this story is Deuteronomy 34:1–6, which describes the death and burial of Moses. Jude, guided by the Spirit, supported the Jewish tradition that Michael contended with the devil about the body of Moses. The fact that Moses was with Elijah on the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17:1–8) allows us to conclude that Michael was victorious over the devil and resurrected Moses.

But who is Michael? In Zechariah 3:1–5, the scene is one of dispute between "the Angel of the LORD" and Satan over the unworthiness of the high priest Joshua. "The Angel of the LORD" pronounces the same verdict on the devil: "The LORD rebuke you, Satan!"—exactly as in Jude 9. This has led many to correctly conclude that Michael the archangel and the angel of the Lord from Zechariah 3 are none other than the preincarnate Christ. The appellation of "Angel" to Christ in no way implies any kind of subordinate position in the Godhead. The word simply means "messenger," and it is evident from a number of other OT passages that this "Angel" is Yahweh. He has the authority of Yahweh and is in fact referred to as Yahweh (see Gen. 16:7, 9, 11; 22:11–18; 31:11–13; Ex. 3:2–6; 14:19; 23:20–23; Judg. 2:1–5; 13:2–23; Hos. 12:3–5). In contrast to Michael, the heretics (v. 10) passed judgment on everything they did not understand while morally corrupting themselves.

Cain, Balaam, and Korah

Jude offers his second trio of examples of evil conduct. This time the focus is on those who led others into sin. The passage opens with woe pronounced against the heretics (v. 11). The intention is to dissuade readers from following these negative examples and to thus avoid sharing their fate. Jude charges the heretics with following the way of Cain, whose crime was murder (Gen. 4:1–16). The heretics had not literally killed anyone, but killing is ultimately rooted in hatred of others (1 John 3:11–15).

The second example is Balaam. Driven by greed, Balaam instructed Balak to use Moabite women to sexually entice the men of Israel and to lead them to sacrifice to the Moabite gods (Num. 25; 31:16). As a result of his actions, Balaam died by the sword (Num. 31:8).

The third example is Korah, the Levite who rejected the authority of Moses—which was actually a rebellion against God (Num. 16). God punished Korah and his followers by causing the earth to split apart and swallow them. Each of these individuals came under God's judgment not only for their own sins but also for leading others astray; the fate of the false teachers troubling the church would be the same.

Jude next commented on the character of the heretics based on five graphic metaphors (vv. 12–13). First, he compared them to spots or blemishes at their love feasts. The Greek term spilades (from spilas; rendered as "blemishes" or "spots") could also designate rocks/reeds under the water. The heretics were like rocks under the surface of the water—which would do irreparable damage to a vessel. In the early church, the Lord's Supper was celebrated as a complete meal called an agapē ("love") meal. These meals, which were supposed to encourage fellowship, had turned into a cause of division (see 1 Cor. 11:17–30). The false teachers became the stain of these meals and caused irreparable damage by their behavior. They were feasting without fear (v. 12), a likely accusation of being devoid of the fear of God (cf. Prov. 15:16). The text also denounces them as acting like shepherds or leaders but feeding and serving themselves rather than their flocks (i.e., those in their care). Jude was most likely alluding to Ezekiel 34:2–10, 18–19, evoking the image of the evil shepherds of Israel who were feeding themselves.

Second, Jude likens them to clouds that never rain, a common image in Scripture (cf. Prov. 25:14). Here, it describes useless teachers—unable to help those who are spiritually thirsty.

Third, the heretics are compared to autumn trees without fruit, twice dead, pulled up by the roots. The reference to fall anticipates the harvest. Without fruit and uprooted suggests a double death: the impossibility of fruitfulness and, consequently, their destruction.

Fourth, Jude says the false teachers are like raging, wild waves of the sea—foaming up their own shame. Wild waves are a typical description of the sea under stormy conditions. The heretics had brought instability and insecurity, serving only to reveal their own immorality.

Finally, the heretics were tagged as "wandering stars." In a time devoid of telescopes, the stars guided travelers. However, a "wandering star" was useless—just like the heretics.

Prophecy of Enoch

Jude 13 closes with a promise of judgment and v. 14 delivers that promise from a rather surprising source: a prophecy about the coming of the Lord attributed to Enoch, the faithful antediluvian mentioned in Genesis 5:24. The saying is part of a widely known pseudepigraphical Jewish work known as 1 Enoch, which was probably written in the third century B.C. Although Enoch did not actually write 1 Enoch, it seems that 1 Enoch refers to a real event that, under the illumination of the Spirit, Jude used as an example of a true prophecy (cf. Acts 17:28; 1 Cor. 15:33; where quotations of extrabiblical sources are used). Jude states that this prophecy was to find its fulfillment in the lives of the heretics at the return of Christ; He will come, accompanied by His angels, to judge all people (Jude 14–15; Matt. 13:41; Mark 8:38; Rom. 2:6; 1 Thess. 3:13; 2 Thess. 1:7).

Christ will come not only to judge but also to convict of sin (Jude 15). The sins of the heretics are ungodly actions stemming from their ungodliness and all the sklēros (lit., "hard" or "rough"; here connoting harsh and defiant words) they have spoken against Christ (cf. Matt. 12:36). They would be held accountable for both their deeds and their words of irreverence toward God—their fundamental sin being their denial of the Lord Jesus Christ (Jude 4).

Jude 16 moves to the final list of evil characteristics of the false teachers. They were discontented and accusing grumblers and were motivated by their own evil desires. One of the chief characteristics of the Exodus generation was grumbling—often against Moses (Ex. 15:24; Num. 14:36) and/or Aaron (Ex. 16:2; Num. 14:2) but principally against God, who had appointed these leaders (Ex. 16:7–9, 12; Num. 14:27, 29). The heretics were not only grumbling but also finding fault with others—probably with church leaders. These were sins not only of the tongue but of the character. In their conduct, they were governed by their own selfish desires (cf. Rom. 7:7–8; Gal. 5:16–17; 1 Tim. 6:9). This accusation may be part of Jude's denunciation of the heretic's unbridled sexual desires (Jude 4–8). His denunciation continues, charging them with speaking arrogantly (v. 16). The focus seems to be on the heretic's arrogance, evidenced through their boasting. Finally, they are charged with flattering people to gain an advantage, feeding the people's egos (cf. 1 Thess. 2:3–5).

Apostolic Prophecy about Dividers

While in vv. 5–16 Jude described characteristics of the heretics, in vv. 17–19 he transitions to a warning mode. Jude turns to apostolic prophecy about the end. "Remember" (v. 17) is the first imperative in the letter. This imperative becomes more common in the rest of the document. Jude then refers to what the apostles had proeirēmenōn (from the verb prolegō). This could mean (and has been translated as) either something previously mentioned or something predicted (v. 17). The audience was expected to remember the oral warnings given by Paul (Acts 20:29–31; 1 Tim. 4:1–2; 2 Tim. 3:1–9) or John (1 John 2:18, 22; 4:1), going back to Christ's Olivet discourse (Matt. 24:11).

The prediction tells us that in the last time there would be empaiktai (from empaiktēs; "scoffers," "mockers," or "cavilers"), who would follow their own evil, ungodly desires (v. 18). Three items deserve attention: First, like other NT writers, Jude recognized that the last days had already begun with the Advent of Christ (see Acts 2:17; 1 Cor. 10:11; Gal. 4:4; Heb. 1:2; 9:26; 1 Pet. 1:20) and acknowledged that the forces of evil were especially hard at work (2 Tim. 3:1–9). Second, the prediction includes the advent of people who ridicule. Peter describes them as those who would deny the certainty of the return of Christ (2 Pet. 3:3–4). They would cause divisions within the church because of their lifestyle (Jude 19). Third, their lifestyle would follow the dictates of their own ungodly desires (see v. 16). The charge stands at the very heart of Jude's warning against the heretics (v. 4).

Jude's final charge against the heretics consists of three vices (v. 19): First, they caused schisms in the congregation—a matter of major concern to Jesus (John 17:21) and the apostles (Rom. 16:17; 1 Cor. 1:10; 11:18; Gal. 5:20; Titus 3:9–10). Scholars have suggested different reasons for the division. The most likely is that of the second vice mentioned in v. 19, namely, that they were psychikoi (from psychikos; lit., "natural" and variously translated as "sensual," "those who follow natural instincts," or "worldly"). In the NT however, a psychikos was placed in contrast to a "spiritual" person. The psychikos was an unspiritual person (see 1 Cor. 2:14; 15:46–49; James 3:15). The third vice, a development of the second, indicates that the heretics did not have the Spirit. The presence of the Spirit of God in someone's life testifies to the Christian experience (Rom. 8:9; 1 Cor. 6:19; 2 Cor. 4:13). The heretics were devoid of the life changing Spirit of God.

Exhortations

At the beginning of the epistle, Jude urged his readers to contend for the faith that was—once for all—delivered and entrusted to God's holy people (v. 3). From that point on to v. 19, he outlined the behavior of the heretics. Next, Jude provided positive instructions on how to contend for the faith.

The emphatic "but you" introduces a contrast between the believers and the heretics. The believers, Jude's beloved friends, are exhorted to build themselves up on their holy faith (v. 20). This construction metaphor is used throughout the NT (e.g., Rom. 15:2, 20; 1 Cor. 8:1; Eph. 2:21; 1 Thess. 5:11) to convey the exact opposite of the division promoted by false teachers (v. 19). The foundation on which the church is to be built is the "holy faith" (v. 20) given to God's people (v. 3). When Christ's followers build on this sacred foundation, their lives are holy—in contrast to the immorality resulting from the antinomian attitude of the false teachers. These individuals were devoid of the Spirit (v. 19), whereas the church is marked by the possession of the Holy Spirit.

Jude continues his catena of exhortations by urging the believers to keep themselves in the love of God. Previously, Jude told them that as God's elect they were "preserved in" or "kept for" Jesus Christ (v. 1). Now, he was exhorting them to keep themselves in the love of God. Jesus told His disciples that to abide in His love is to keep His commandment (John 15:10)—contrary to the false teachers' practice. The church is also to look for the mercy of Jesus Christ for eternal life (v. 21). The Christian hope of the Second Coming is directly linked to Christian behavior (1 Thess. 1:9–10). Hope does not lead to escapism but determines how one lives in the present age.

With vv. 22 and 23, Jude provides instruction for how to deal with those persuaded by the heretics. There is a manuscript difference in v. 22: According to some manuscripts, the last word of the verse is a participle in the nominative case, which refers to those having compassion or mercy. Jude was admonishing believers to have compassion, but in the process they were to be "making a distinction"—evidently between different cases (cf. v. 23). Other manuscripts have the participle in the accusative case, which refers to those who were doubting and who should receive the mercy and compassion of those who are in the faith. Both ideas fit with the following verse (cf. Matt. 5:7; James 1:6). They were also to save others by grabbing them and pulling them out of the fire (cf. Zech. 3:2). The fire from which some needed deliverance is most likely that of the final judgment (2 Thess. 1:7–8; 2 Pet. 3:7, 10; Rev. 20:9). Since these people needed to be snatched from the fire, the implication is that they had capitulated to the teaching of the heretics. For Jude, the possibility of apostasy was real. Care for errant members should be a key value in the life of the church (Matt. 18:15–20; 1 Cor. 5:1–5; 1 Thess. 5:14; 2 Thess. 3:6–15).

The last rescue operation concerns those whose tunics were stained/defiled by the flesh. Jude previously spoke about the "flesh" in relationship to the sin of Sodom and Gomorrah (see commentary on 5–7) and the heretics who had defiled the flesh (i.e., their bodies; v. 8). Most likely, Jude had in mind sexual immorality since this was the hallmark of the heretic's life (vv. 4–8, 10–12, 16, 18). Believers are expected to show mercy even to such individuals. However, this mercy is to be mixed with "fear" because of the contaminating power of sin. Believers in such rescue operations must be on guard against becoming defiled themselves (see Gal. 6:1).

Doxology

Jude concludes his letter in a positive manner by offering a doxology of praise to God, who is able to keep His followers from stumbling (see John 17:12). Paul expressed a similar idea when he told the Thessalonians that God would shelter them from the evil one (2 Thess. 3:3). This work of God goes together with our responsibility to keep ourselves in God's love (v. 21). While salvation is the work of God, it requires a human response.

God not only guards His children but also wants to present them faultless in His presence with great joy. The term "faultless/blameless" was used with reference to sacrificial animals, which had to be flawless (Lev. 1:3; 3:1). Through Christ's blameless sacrifice, believers have the assurance that they are counted as blameless before God (Col. 1:22; Heb. 9:14).

Praises are further lifted to Him as God our Savior. Usually, Christ is portrayed as the Savior in the NT (e.g., Luke 2:11; John 4:42; Eph. 5:23)—with some exceptions (Luke 1:47;

1 Tim. 1:1; 4:10; Titus 2:10; 2 Pet. 3:2). The OT is filled with the confession that God is the Savior (Deut. 32:15; Pss. 24:5; 25:5; 27:9). Christ is God, and the triune God—including the Holy Spirit—is involved in this salvific work (e.g., John 3:5; Titus 3:5).

It is common in doxologies to praise God's attributes of glory, majesty, dominion, authority, and power (1 Tim. 6:16; 1 Pet. 5:11) because these are attributes of God. He did not acquire them; they are His now and forever. Jude's time reference covers past, present, and future. The picture is of cosmic dimension and anticipates a time when all will praise God's glory, majesty, and power forever. This is part of the Christian hope.

PROPHECY

REVELATION

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The opening words provide the title of the book. The word "revelation" comes from the Greek word apokalypsis ("uncovering," "unveiling"), which is related to the modern English word "apocalypse." The title shows that the Apocalypse is from Jesus Christ and that He is the central figure of the book, which provides a description of Him and His post-Calvary ministry on behalf of His people.

The author of Revelation identifies himself simply as John (1:1–4, 9; 22:8). Although the book does not specify which John this was, the fact that he did not find it necessary to further identify himself shows that he was well-known to the original readers. The earliest Christian authors unanimously identified him as the Apostle John, the son of Zebedee (Matt. 10:2) and the author of the fourth Gospel and the three epistles bearing his name. This identification is affirmed by numerous verbal parallels between Revelation and the Gospel of John.

Date. John received the visions of Revelation while he was on Patmos, a small rocky island in the Aegean Sea southwest of Ephesus. The island was ten miles (16 km) long and six miles (10 km) wide at its widest part. Early tradition testifies that the Roman authorities banished him to this remote island because of his faithfulness to the proclamation of the gospel (Rev. 1:9). The majority of scholars today hold that the book was written around A.D. 95, near the end of the reign of Emperor Domitian. This dating is unanimously affirmed by early Christian authors such as Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen, as well as the Muratorian Canon.

Backgrounds. Revelation was originally written to the seven Christian congregations in the most populous cities of Asia Minor (Rev. 1:4, 11), which was the southwestern part of modern Turkey. At that time, Christians suffered all kinds of pressure from pagans, including opposition for their refusal to participate in pagan religious activities. Christians were accused of atheism for not participating in the worship of emperors and pagan gods. Consequently, they were threatened with losing their legal status in the city and suffered social isolation, persecution, and martyrdom. However, a more severe persecution was yet to come. The book was therefore written to encourage the Christians in those churches in the midst of their dire situations. Although the book was originally sent to the churches in Asia Minor, Revelation was not written only for them but also for all Christians throughout history.

Interpretative Approaches to Revelation. In the last several centuries, the question of how to interpret the prophecies of Revelation and apply them historically has generated much scholarly debate. Today, there are four distinct interpretative approaches to the book.

Preterism. Preterism (from Lat. preter, "past") as a method of interpretation places the whole significance of Revelation in the past. According to this view, the book deals exclusively with the situation of the Christian church in Asia Minor in its struggle with Rome at the time the book was written. Understood in this way, Revelation offers no predictions of the future. John wrote only about events that took place in his time or in his immediate future. The whole purpose of the book was to encourage the Christians of John's day to persevere in their faithfulness to God.

Futurism. In contrast to preterism, the futurist method interprets the prophecies of Revelation exclusively from an end-time perspective. Futurist interpreters hold that chapters 4–22 will be fulfilled shortly before the Second Coming. In other words, the prophecies of Revelation will be fulfilled in the time of the last generation of Christians. Futurism interprets the symbols of Revelation as literally as possible. Today, this is the method of most Protestant Evangelicals.

Idealism. The idealist approach is based on preterist ideas. While recognizing that Revelation describes what was happening to the Christians in the first century, idealist interpreters contend that the book describes in vivid symbolism the ongoing struggle between good and evil that will result in God's ultimate triumph over evil. With this understanding, the book does not talk about literal events that were fulfilled in the past or that will be fulfilled in the future but generally provides guidance to every generation of Christians through its vivid symbolism. Idealism is the successor to the allegorical interpretation of the Bible that characterized the centuries-long medieval interpretation of the Scriptures.

Historicism. The historicist approach of prophetic interpretation holds that Revelation uses symbolic presentations to portray the history between the first century and the time of the end. Some prophecies of the book have been fulfilled in the past from our perspective today, some refer to the present time, and some have yet to be fulfilled. Historicism was the method of prophetic interpretation used by Protestants until the nineteenth century, when precedence was given to other interpretative approaches.

Evaluating these approaches reveals a defect in preterism: it limits the relevance of Revelation's messages to first-century Christians. Similarly, futurism limits the prophecies of Revelation exclusively to the last generation of Christians. These two methods imply that Revelation has nothing to offer the generations between John's time and the end time. However, careful analysis of the book shows that while the first three chapters primarily concern John's time (see Rev. 1:11), the focus of chapters 4–11 is on the movements and events in Christian history from the first century until the end time, and chapters 12–22 deal primarily with the events that will occur at the end time. As a result, preterism and futurism cannot reliably be used in the interpretation of the book of Revelation.

A major problem with preterism and idealism is their denial of the predictive prophecies of the book. Revelation claims to be a book of prophecy (Rev. 1:3; 22:7, 10). John the Revelator states clearly in both the introduction and conclusion of the book that its purpose is to show God's people the events that were going to take place in the future (1:1; 22:6). Any interpretative method that denies the predictive nature of the prophecies of Revelation pays no heed to the obvious claims of the book. Both preterism and idealism fail on this ground.

This leaves historicism as the only adequate approach for prophetic interpretation. Historicism sees the events predicted in Revelation as taking place both in the past and the future as well as in the centuries that lie between. This method also recognizes the spiritual applications of the book's messages. It therefore becomes evident through using the historicist approach that the messages of Revelation are relevant to all generations until the end of the age.

Organization and Structure of Revelation. Understanding the basic structure of a book helps the reader fit smaller sections into the book's overall theme and safeguards the reader against interpreting passages in isolation from the rest of the volume. Understanding the literary arrangement of Revelation helps unpack the broad meaning of the text within the context of the entire book.

At least three organizational structures may be observed in Revelation, none of which are mutually exclusive. Considered together, they unpack a wide spectrum of theological themes and motifs within the book.

Chiastic Structure. The word "chiasm" is derived from the Greek cross-shaped letter X (read as chi). This literary feature is used widely in the OT. While modern literary structures are typically based on an A–B–C outline, the chiastic structure is based on an A–B–A′ outline. The climax of the text is set in the center with the corresponding sections moving up to and away from it—section A parallels section A′ at the end, B to B′, until we come to the center, C. An understanding of how a chiasm works helps us discern the theological emphasis of the content of the book as intended by the inspired author. We suggest the following chiastic structure of Revelation:

A. Prologue (1:1–8)
  B. The messages to the seven churches: promises to the overcomers (1:9—3:22)
    C. The seven seals: God's work for the salvation of humanity (4:1—8:1)
      D. The seven trumpets: God's wrath mixed with mercy (8:2—11:18)
        E. The great conflict between Christ and Satan (11:19—14:20)
      D′. The seven last plagues: God's wrath unmixed with mercy (15:1—18:24)

C'. God's work for the salvation of humanity completed (19:1—21:4)
B'. The restored earth: promises to the overcomers fulfilled (21:5—22:5)
A'. Epilogue (22:6–21)

One might observe that the first half of this structure (A–D) focuses on the entire history of the Christian age while its chiastic counterparts (D'–A') focus on the time of the end. The segment at the center points to the central theological theme of the book (11:19—14:20): the great conflict between Christ and the satanic triumvirate (Satan, the sea beast, and the earth beast). This shows that the entire book was written with a focus on the Great Controversy and a special emphasis on the final conflict at the conclusion of this world's history, which includes the coming of Christ and the establishment of God's eternal kingdom.

Sanctuary Imagery. The structure of the book of Revelation also alludes to some of the sanctuary services in the OT. The book is replete with references to the temple or tabernacle and some its furniture. In this structure, Revelation falls into seven major parts, each of which is introduced with a heavenly sanctuary scene. The book pictures all divine actions on earth as a direct result of the activities in the heavenly temple:

Prologue (1:1–8)
  1. Introductory sanctuary scene (1:9–20)
    The messages to the seven churches (chaps. 2–3)
  2. Introductory sanctuary scene (chaps. 4–5)
    The seven seals (6:1—8:1)
  3. Introductory sanctuary scene (8:2–5)
    The seven trumpets (8:6—11:18)
  4. Introductory sanctuary scene (11:19)
    The wrath of the nations (12:1—15:4)
  5. Introductory sanctuary scene (15:5–8)
    The seven last plagues (chaps. 16–18)
  6. Introductory sanctuary scene (19:1–10)
    The eschatological consummation (19:11—21:1)
  7. Introductory sanctuary scene (21:2–8)
    The new Jerusalem (21:9—22:5)
Epilogue (22:6–21)

This sevenfold structure of Revelation reflects the daily and annual services of the earthly sanctuary and provides insight into the occurrences in the book that would otherwise be indiscernible:

1. Revelation 1:9–20. The first vision of Revelation pictures Christ in the midst of seven lampstands, wearing the garments of the high priest. The lampstands represent the seven major churches in Asia Minor in John's day. Jesus is portrayed as ministering to the churches in their needs in a way similar to the priests of the earthly temple. However, this scene does not necessarily describe the heavenly sanctuary as the whole vision is set on earth, not in heaven. The sanctuary imagery is used only to illustrate Jesus's activities on behalf of the churches as the high priest.

2. Revelation 4–5. In this vision, the scene shifts from earth to heaven (Rev. 4:1), taking place in the throne room of the heavenly temple where the Holy Place and the holy of holies are merged into one room. There are more allusions to the sanctuary and its furnishings in these two chapters than anywhere else in the book. It is in this room that John witnessed Christ's enthronement in His royal and priestly ministry, which took place at His ascension to heaven (see "Enthronement Scene," p. 1952).

3. Revelation 8:2–5. This sanctuary scene pictures an angel receiving incense, which represents the prayers of God's people, and offering it on the golden altar of incense before God. In response to the prayers, judgments in the form of fire are hurled at rebellious humanity. This scene clearly shows that intercession is taking place in the heavenly sanctuary.

4. Revelation 11:19. The heavenly temple is open in this vision, with the ark of the covenant in its innermost part, the Most Holy Place. While the sanctuary imagery shows that the events in the first half of the book were to occur in the context of Christ's mediatory ministry in the Holy Place, Revelation 11:19 points to the beginning of a new phase of Christ's ministry in the heavenly sanctuary. The book shows that before the Second Coming, judgment was to take place in heaven (14:7) to separate the faithful from those who spurn God's mercy. At the conclusion of the pre-Advent judgment, Christ will come to reward every person according to his or her deeds.

5. Revelation 15:5–8. At the conclusion of the proclamation of the end-time gospel (14:6–20), the temple in heaven is presented as being filled with God's glory, so that no one is able to enter to receive forgiveness (see 1 Kin. 8:10–11). This is the conclusion of Christ's mediatory ministry in the heavenly sanctuary, as the destiny of every person has been decided and there is no more need for intercession.

6. Revelation 19:1–10. A scene of jubilant rejoicing over the destruction of end-time Babylon is seen next. Although the entire scene takes place in the heavenly temple (cf. Rev. 4–5), no reference to the temple and its furnishings is made because the heavenly temple has lost its function as the place of intercession. Christ's mediatory ministry on behalf of human beings no longer takes place there.

7. Revelation 21:2–8. The last sanctuary scene brings the reader back to earth. John saw that there is no temple in the new Jerusalem because the abiding presence of God makes it a city-temple (21:22). The earthly sanctuary was the place where God symbolically dwelled among His people, but on the new earth, there will no longer be a need for a temple as a symbol of God's presence because God will be literally present with His people in the new Jerusalem for all eternity.

The sequence of these introductory sanctuary scenes reveals the line of progression of the heavenly sanctuary services, beginning with the inauguration and continuing with the phases of intercession, judgment, the close of intercession, and the absence of priestly activities. The sequence concludes with the actualization of God's literal presence with His people in the new Jerusalem.

1. Revelation 1:12–20	Earth
2. Revelation 4–5 Inauguration
3. Revelation 8:3–5 Intercession	↑
4. Revelation 11:19 Judgment	Heaven
5. Revelation 15:5–8 Cessation	↓
6. Revelation 19:1–10 Absence
7. Revelation 21:2—22:5	Earth

The structure of Revelation, which is based on the daily and yearly pattern of the earthly sanctuary, helps us locate the key visions of the book within history. It points to Revelation 11:19 as a dividing line between the historical and end-time sections of Revelation. While the first half of the book focuses primarily on the Christian age, the second half focuses primarily on the time of the end. This suggests that the visions of the seven seals and the seven trumpets, which fall in the first half, span Christian history, while the seven last plagues, which are in the second half, will take place at the time of the end.

Threefold Structure. Apart from the prologue (1:1–8) and the epilogue (21:6—22:21), the main body of Revelation falls into three distinct parts: (1) the messages to the seven churches (1:9—3:22), which primarily address the specific problematic situations the seven main churches in Asia Minor were facing in John's day but also represent seven distinct church eras; (2) the historical section (4:1—11:18) that focuses primarily on the sweep of history from the first century until the time of the end (first with the seals and then with the trumpets); and (3) the eschatological section (11:19—22:5) that focuses primarily on the time of the end and the events leading up to the coming of Christ, the eternal destruction of Satan, and the establishment of God's kingdom. These divisions are related to the three periods of history from the book's perspective: John's time, the Christian age, and the time of the end.

Theology. Revelation has been appropriately placed at the end of the NT. In this book, "all the books of the Bible meet and end" (AA 585). The overarching theme of Revelation is that God has redeemed us through the Lamb, will defeat the forces of evil, and will establish His everlasting kingdom. The elements of theology within this theme are (1) God; (2) the Great Controversy; (3) salvation; (4) the people of God; and (5) eschatology.

1. God. In Revelation, God is revealed as a Trinity working on behalf of human beings (1:4–6; 4–5). While united in purpose and activity, the three divine Beings are distinct in personality. The first Person of the Godhead is the Father, referred to as the Eternal One (1:4, 8; 4:8; 16:5). The phrase often translated as "who is and who was and who is to come" (1:4, 8) is most likely a reference to the divine name Yahweh (Ex. 3:14) and denotes the eternal existence of God in terms of the past, present, and future. He is the Alpha and the Omega, which are the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, the Beginning and the End (Rev. 1:8; 21:6). God is the Creator and Sustainer of heaven and earth and of all things in them (4:11; 10:6; 14:7). He is also the sovereign Ruler over all creation—His throne is mentioned more than forty times in the book.

He is the Lord God Almighty (pantokratōr; 4:8; 11:17; 21:22), a title that refers to His omnipotence; as such, He is the only one to be worshiped (14:7; 15:4). Lastly, He is the Judge; the whole world is to stand before His throne in judgment (20:11–15).

The second Person of the Godhead is Jesus Christ. Several titles are used in reference to Him, including the Son of Man (1:13), "the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David" (5:5), the "Offspring of David" and the "Morning Star" (22:16), the "Word of God" (19:13), and the Lord of lords and King of kings (17:14). However, Christ's most prominent title is the Lamb (5:6; 13:8), which appears twenty-eight times in the book and points to His sacrificial death on behalf of all human beings. In Revelation, Jesus Christ has all the OT characteristics of God. His equality with the Father is explicit: He is "the Alpha and the Omega" and "the Beginning and the End" (22:13), titles applied to the Father (1:8; 21:6); He is "the First and the Last" (1:17; 22:13), a title claimed by God alone in the OT (Is. 44:6; 48:12); and He is the Beginning, Ruler, and Originator of God's creation (Rev. 3:14) in that it began with Him. In addition, Jesus and the Father are presented as being worshiped equally (5:13–14; 7:9–10; cf. 19:10, where only God is worshiped); they both express wrath (6:16); they jointly claim the heavenly throne (22:1, 3); and they both share the kingdom (11:15). This sets Christ apart from other beings in the universe, a point that is furthered by the fact that He took the form of a servant (Phil. 2:7) and became the God-man, the Davidic Messiah (5:5; 22:16) who, by virtue of His sacrificial death and resurrection, has provided for the redemption of humanity (1:17–18; 5:9–10). At His ascension, He was inaugurated into his royal and priestly ministry in the heavenly sanctuary (chap. 5), and at the end of history, He will come as the Divine Warrior to wage the final war against the forces of evil (19:11–21) and establish God's eternal kingdom.

The third Person of the Godhead is the Holy Spirit. He is symbolically referred to as the seven spirits of God (1:4; 3:1; 4:5; 5:6), an expression that refers to the universality and fullness of the Spirit's activity in the world, seven being a number of fullness. The Holy Spirit communicated the visions of Revelation to John (1:10; 4:2; 17:3; 21:10) and conveyed Christ's messages to the churches through him (2:7, 11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, 22; 14:13; 22:17).

2. The Great Controversy. In Revelation, the earth is portrayed as the arena of the great cosmic conflict between God and Satan. This conflict originated in heaven with the usurper, named the devil and Satan (12:9), the serpent (12:9; 20:2) of Genesis 3:15, and the archenemy of God and His people (12:10). The key issue of the conflict concerns who the real ruler of the universe is. In Revelation, Satan is a real enemy and his existence is undeniable. He and his evil forces stand behind all the evil in the world, and his activities on earth intensify at the end of time. In the final conflict, Satan finds two allies in an attempt to achieve his goal: the sea beast (13:1–10) and the earth beast (13:11–18). With the key issue in the final drama related to worship and God's law, the people on earth are identified as either the worshipers of the true God or the followers and worshipers of Satan. The final conflict will once and forever resolve the question of God's right to rule over His creation. God's people are in the midst of the conflict, looking forward to the coming of the Lord as their only hope of ultimate deliverance. This end-time conflict will result in God's triumph over Satan and his forces and the establishment of God's everlasting kingdom.

3. Salvation. Revelation recognizes the existence of sin in the world. The book agrees with the four Gospels that the salvation of fallen humanity was accomplished by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ on the cross and His defeat of Satan (1:5–6; 5:9–10; 7:10), but it goes one step further. After His ascension, Jesus was inaugurated into His post-Calvary ministry on behalf of His people as King and Priest, and this divine inauguration marked Satan's permanent expulsion from heaven (12:7–12). The only hope for God's people to gain victory over sin is found in the blood of the Lamb (7:14; 12:11) and in Jesus's ministry on their behalf in the heavenly sanctuary. Entrance into God's kingdom is granted on the condition of total obedience and loyalty to God, but the righteous deeds of the saved are a direct result of divine activity in their lives (7:14; 19:8). All those who spurn God's gift of salvation and refuse to repent become the prey of demonic forces (9:4; 13:3; 14) and will share in the destiny of Satan and his evil servants.

4. The People of God. While in Revelation this world is in a state of rebellion against God, He has faithful people who choose to follow and obey Him. They are referred to as servants of God (7:3), saints or God's holy people (e.g., 11:18; 13:7; 14:12; 17:6; 18:24), the wife or bride of the Lamb (19:7), a kingdom of priests (1:6; 5:10), the followers of the Lamb (14:4), and the remnant (12:17), among other things. They are comprised of people from all tribes, tongues or languages, peoples, and nations (5:9), and they are regularly portrayed as being with Christ in heavenly places (14:1–5; 15:1–4), unlike the wicked, who are regularly referred to as the earth's inhabitants. God's people appear as targets of oppression and persecution in a hostile world (6:9–11; 11:7; 12:13–17). The people of God have strengths and weaknesses, yet they are presented as the victorious people of God. The purpose of the book is to instruct them on how to remain faithful and obedient to Christ as they wait for the future to unfold. Throughout history, God's people have been portrayed as a faithful woman, which is a symbol of the true church (chap. 12). However, Revelation presents this faithful woman as turning at the time of the end into a deceptive prostitute, siding with Satan (17:1–6). God's faithful people then appear as the remnant, which is comprised of those who follow God's principles and who have placed their faith in Jesus (12:17; 14:12). These faithful followers are commissioned to preach the end-time gospel to the world (10:8–11; 11:3–14; 14:3–12). The book concludes with a glorious picture of the long-awaited union of Christ and His people at the Second Coming, metaphorically portrayed as a wedding in the new Jerusalem (19:7–9; 21:9).

5. Eschatology. The entire book of Revelation is written from the perspective of the end time and the establishment of God's kingdom. While the first half of the book portrays the spiritual struggles of the church in the world throughout the seven Christian ages, the fundamental focus of chapters 11–22 is on Satan's end-time activities in the world and God's subsequent response to them. This section depicts Satan working to seduce the people in the world (chap. 13). At that time, a final proclamation of the end-time gospel will go throughout the world (14:6–13), resulting in a great separation between those on God's side and those on Satan's side (14:14–20). Following that, the wicked will experience the results of their choices in the outpouring of the seven last plagues (chaps. 15–16). The book concludes with God's ultimate triumph over Satan and his evil forces (chaps. 17–20) and the establishment of God's everlasting kingdom (chaps. 21–22). All these things are revealed to God's people so that they will be ready for what will happen and will not be taken by surprise.

Literary Features. Revelation portrays the broad sweep of history while maintaining a focus on the conclusion of world history and God's triumph over evil. The contents of the book were communicated to John in symbolic presentations (1:1–2) that appealed to the first-century readers of the book, who would have been familiar with the symbolic language of biblical and Jewish apocalyptic literature after which Revelation is styled. The contents of the book are saturated with scenes and images from the OT, which necessitates a good working knowledge of the OT for proper interpretation. Revelation is a Christian book at the center of which is Christ's saving work. It is only in Christ that the messages of Revelation receive their ultimate meaning and significance.

COMMENTARY

PROLOGUE

The prologue of Revelation provides a general summary of the whole book. It states how and for what purpose the book was written and defines the book's main themes.

1:1–3

Introduction

After providing the title of the book, this section explains how Revelation was transmitted from Christ via John to the churches and concludes with a blessing. The opening statement generates the title of the book. The Greek word translated as "revelation" is apokalypsis, literally meaning "uncovering" or "unveiling." In the NT, it is used exclusively for divine revelation (Rom. 16:25; Eph. 3:5). The opening phrase shows that Revelation both came from Jesus Christ and is about Him, decidedly establishing Christ as the central figure of the book (Rev. 1:8; 22:13).

The purpose of the book of Revelation is to show the things that would soon occur (see 22:6). In the Greek, the words used here are an allusion to Daniel 2:28 (LXX) and to Jesus's apocalyptic discourse on the Mount of Olives (Matt. 24:6). Elsewhere in Revelation, the end is referred to as being near (22:7, 12, 20). With the death of Jesus on the cross at Calvary, the history of this world has entered the beginning of the end, and the end has been increasingly near for every generation since. John specifies that the future events were "signified" or "made known" to him by Christ. The Greek word sēmainō means "to show by means of a symbol," and in the NT, this word is used for figurative presentations of a future event (John 21:19; Acts 11:28). It also appears in Daniel 2:45 (LXX) where Daniel explains to King Nebuchadnezzar that God had shown the king what would take place in the future by means of a symbol (i.e., the statue made of gold, silver, bronze, and iron). The visions of Revelation were thus shown to John in figurative or symbolic presentations, and this calls for a symbolic interpretation of the majority of the book.

The content of Revelation is described as the word of God because, like all prophetic messages in the OT (Jer. 1:2; Hos. 1:1; Joel 1:1; Zech. 1:1), it originated with God. It is also described as the testimony of Jesus Christ because Jesus communicated it to John in vision. In Revelation 19:10, the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy. Revelation thus originated with God since Christ communicated it to John as His testimony and John passed it on to God's people as the words of prophecy (see 1:3).

We find the first of seven beatitudes in v. 3. It promises blessings to its reader (cf. Luke 11:28), who is the person who reads Revelation ("the words of this prophecy") to the church and makes it understandable. Those who hear are the assembled congregation listening to the reading. While reading and hearing are important, the full blessing is promised to those who heed the messages of the book, for "the time is near" (Rev. 1:3).

Trinitarian Greeting

John's opening address to the seven churches in Asia (v. 4) is reminiscent of the opening statement in some of Paul's letters (1 Cor. 1:1–2; Phil. 1:1). This shows that Revelation is a letter that was written in prophetic style and was originally sent to the local Christian congregations in western Asia Minor, located in modern-day Turkey. Yet, while originally sent to those who lived in the past, the book is also written for all Christians throughout history. The greeting formula containing grace and peace was a common one in the early church (cf. Rom. 1:7; 1 Pet. 1:2). It was a combination of two well-known addresses: the Greek charis and the Hebrew shalom. It encapsulates the idea that it is because of God's grace that His people enjoy peace—with God, with others, and with themselves.

The suppliers of grace and peace are the three members of the Godhead, the first of whom is God the Father. The description of Him as the Eternal One who is, who was, and who is to come is a reference to the divine name Yahweh (1:4; cf. Ex. 3:14) and denotes the eternal existence of God in terms of the past, present, and future. The reference to the seven spirits of God is a symbolic way of declaring the Holy Spirit to be the second member of the Godhead (v. 4). The phrase describes the fullness of His work in the seven churches, seven being a number of fullness.

The third member of the Godhead is identified by name: Jesus Christ (v. 5). He is the faithful witness, the firstborn from the dead, and the ruler over the kings of the earth. These three titles refer to Jesus's death, resurrection, and heavenly reign, respectively. The OT background of these titles is Psalm 89:27, 37 (LXX), where the Davidic king is referred to as Yahweh's firstborn, the most exalted king, reigning as the faithful witness. These three titles introduce Jesus as the fulfillment of all OT messianic hopes and longings.

Having described who Jesus is, John next writes about what Jesus did. His three titles correspond to Christ's three activities on His people's behalf: He loved us, He died on the cross for us, and He "washed" or "freed" us (there is only one letter difference in Greek between "washed" and "freed") from our sins through His own blood and raised us to the status of kings and priests (v. 5; see Rev. 5:9–10). Once again, Revelation alludes to the history of Israel recorded in the OT: because God loved Israel (Deut. 7:6–8), He delivered them from Egyptian slavery and promised them that they would be a kingdom of priests on earth (Ex. 19:5–6). All these promises, originally given to Israel, are, in the NT, applied to the Israel of faith (1 Pet. 2:9–10).

The Keynote of the Book

The prologue concludes with the keynote of the book: the Christian hope, the return of Christ in power and glory. John describes it by employing wording from Daniel 7:13, which says "Coming with the clouds"; Zechariah 12:10, where mourning for the One they pierced is mentioned; and Jesus's speech on the Mount of Olives: "Coming on the clouds" and "all . . . of the earth will mourn" (Matt. 24:30). In this way, John wanted us to understand that the personal and literal coming of Christ is rooted in biblical prophecy and in Jesus's promise to come again. Revelation points here to a special resurrection of certain persons just before Christ returns (cf. Dan. 12:2). John wrote that Christ is coming (1:7). In the NT, Christ referred to His coming with the phrase "I am coming" rather than "I will come." The prophetic present tense refers to the future event as already occurring, which affirms the certainty of Christ's promise to come again. This certainty is further established with the Greek words nai and amēn, the first of which is an affirmative word ("yes," "certainly") and the second the Greek transliteration of the Hebrew word amēn. The combination of these two words expresses an emphatic affirmation. This certainty of Christ's return is reaffirmed at the conclusion of the book (22:20).

The concluding words of the prologue are those of self-identification (v. 8; see also 22:13). Alpha is the first letter and Omega the last letter of the Greek alphabet, so the phrase in v. 8 is akin to saying "I am from A to Z." It affirms that Christ is the One who is eternal and powerful (see also 4:8; 11:17), and it assures the readers that Christ's return is as certain as His integrity and His ability to do what He says. The promise to come again is given by the same God who has kept all of His promises in the past, so we can rest in the certainty that this one will be fulfilled as well.

1:9—3:22

MESSAGES TO THE SEVEN CHURCHES

The first major division of the book consists of two parts: John's vision of the glorified Christ (1:9–20) and the messages to the seven churches (chaps. 2–3).

1:9–20

Vision of the Glorified Christ

This introductory vision to the seven churches describes the circumstances in which John had his visionary encounter with the glorified Christ, who commissioned him to record the things he was about to witness and pass them on to the seven churches.

1:9. Place and Circumstances. John wrote Revelation without formally introducing himself to the original readers. The self-designation "I, John" shows that he and the Christians in Asia knew each other. Other early Christian authors unanimously identify him as the Apostle John, son of Zebedee and author of the fourth Gospel (Matt. 10:2). John's self-identification is reminiscent of "I, Daniel," which occurs regularly in the prophetic section of the book of Daniel

(Dan. 8:15, 27; 9:2; 10:2, 7; 12:5). This shows that Revelation builds on the book of Daniel and that together the books appear to be like a two-volume set.

John further affirmed his relationship with the Christians in Asia by identifying himself as their brother and fellow participant in suffering. The Greek word thlipsis denotes a situation in which someone is under pressure that crushes, and in this instance, the word describes the suffering of the Christians in Asia as a result of their faithfulness to Christ. John himself went through such tribulation on Patmos, a barren, rocky island in the Aegean Sea some fifty miles (80 km) from Ephesus. Early Christian authors testify that the Romans used it, along with other islands in the area, as a penal colony for political offenders. John was banished there because of his faithful preaching of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ (see Rev. 1:1–2).

1:10. Time. John states that he was taken in a vision "in the Spirit," as he does elsewhere in the book (4:2; 17:3; 21:10). He says this to let his readers know that the messages of Revelation are not a product of human will but a record of what was revealed to him in vision by the Holy Spirit (2 Pet. 1:20–21).

The vision took place on "the Lord's Day," an enigmatic phrase that has occasioned several views of what the Lord's Day is. Although later in history it became associated with Sunday, the Bible indicates that the Lord's Day is the seventh-day Sabbath (Ex. 31:13; Is. 58:13; Ezek. 20:12). In addition, Jesus pointed to Himself as Lord of the Sabbath (Mark 2:28). Together, these two facts show that John was taken into vision on the seventh day of the week, the Sabbath. Another day the Bible refers to as the Lord's day is the eschatological "day of the Lord" mentioned often in both the OT (Is. 13:6–13; Amos 5:18–20; Zeph. 1:14) and NT (1 Thess. 5:2; 2 Pet. 3:10). Since the Sabbath in the Bible has eschatological significance (Is. 58:13–14), it is quite possible that John used the expression "the Lord's Day" to show that he was taken in the vision on the Sabbath to witness the events leading up to the eschatological day of the Lord (see Rev. 1:7). Such an understanding is consistent with the portrayal of the final events in Revelation, in which the Sabbath will have central significance in the end-time drama (see Rev. 14:7).

1:11–16. Vision of Christ. While in vision, John heard the voice of Christ, which sounded to him like a trumpet. In the Bible, a trumpet-like voice represents the voice of God (Ex. 19:16). The voice instructed John to record the things he was about to witness in vision and to send them to the seven churches located in the major cities of the Roman province of Asia at the end of the first century: Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos/Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea. In John's day, there were more than seven churches in Asia, including those in Colossae, Troas, and Hierapolis. That only these seven were chosen shows their universal significance due to the symbolism of seven being a number of fullness. Thus, those churches represent the Christian church as a whole throughout history.

In the vision, John saw Christ in the midst of seven golden lampstands, each of which stood with a lamp at the top. Later, Christ explained that these lampstands symbolize the seven churches (1:20). In the Israelite temple, the lampstand provided light (1 Kin. 7:49), representing God's plan for Israel to be His light-bearing witness to world (Is. 42:6–7; 60:1–3). Such is the role of the church in the world today (Matt. 5:14–16; Phil. 2:15).

John saw Christ dressed in a garment that went down to the feet with a golden band around His chest, which was the attire of the high priest in the OT (Ex. 28:6–28). The daily task of a priest in the Jerusalem temple was to keep the lamps in the Holy Place burning brightly. He would trim and refill the lamps that were waning and would replace the wick on the lamps that had gone out, refill them with fresh oil, and relight them (Ex. 30:7–8). In the context of this temple background, Christ appeared in the role of a priest performing the daily services and ministering to the churches by helping them in their needs. He has full knowledge of the spiritual conditions and needs of each church.

The exalted Christ appeared like the Son of Man, which is a way of saying "like a human being." This title was Jesus's favorite self-designation (Matt. 26:45; Mark 13:26) and is a direct allusion to Daniel 7:13. John's portrayal of Christ mirrors the description of the manlike divine figure in Daniel 10:5–12 and combines it with some of the OT characteristics of God.

The use of the word "like" points to the metaphoric meaning of Christ's descriptions. Christ's hair was white like wool (v. 14), just as the hair of the Ancient of Days in Daniel was (7:9), signifying wisdom and experience (cf. Job 15:10; Prov. 20:29). His eyes were like flames, denoting His ability to penetrate the innermost secrets of the human heart (Rev. 2:18, 23). His feet were like bronze, symbolizing stability and strength (v. 15; Ezek. 1:7), and the sound of His voice was like many waters, representing the powerful voice of God (Ezek. 43:2). Jesus was also equipped with a sharp sword coming out of His mouth (Rev. 1:16; Heb. 4:12), and in the vision, He appeared and acted in the full authority of God. Finally, His face was like the shining sun in all its brilliance (v. 16), just as the divine being's face was in Daniel's vision (Dan. 10:6), and it indicated Jesus's exaltation (Matt. 17:2). All of these clearly show that in this humanlike figure, John recognized the glorified Lord with all of His divine characteristics and prerogatives.

These divine characteristics are recorded in the opening section of the message to the seven churches. As such, they are connected to the particular situations of the churches, to each of which Jesus was to come as the One who could relate to their peculiar circumstances and needs.

1:17–20. John's Encounter with Christ. Having seen Christ in His glory, John collapsed at His feet in awe (v. 17), just as he had done on the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17:6–7). This is the common reaction of a person in the presence of God's glory (Josh. 5:14; Matt. 28:9). Christ's reassuring words in v. 17, "Do not be afraid," are in the present imperative in Greek, indicating the action is already in progress—Jesus told John to stop being afraid, just as He had often stated before (Matt. 17:7; 28:10; John 6:20).

By referring to Himself as "the First and the Last" in v. 17, Jesus assumed the title of the God of the OT (Is. 44:6; 48:12). This title points to the divinity of Jesus. The Greek word for "last" is eschatos, from which the word "eschatology" comes. This shows that the focus of eschatology in Revelation is not end-time events but Jesus Christ and His presence with His people. Revelation presents Him as having the last word regarding the final events; He is the Living One, in possession of the keys of death and Hades. Keys are a symbol of power and authority. Christ has conquered death by experiencing it and returning to life. God's people need not fear death any longer, because death and Hades, referring to the abode of the dead, are under His control.

Christ commissioned John to record the things shown to him in vision (vv. 11, 19). They are categorized into three groups in v. 19: what he had seen, which refers to the vision of the exalted Christ (1:1–18); what was present, referring to the messages addressing the current situations in the seven churches in Asia (chaps. 2–3); and what would happen after that (see 4:1), which refers to the prophecies regarding what would occur throughout history until the time of the end.

In the conclusion of His words to John, Christ makes an interposed explanation regarding the meaning of the stars in His hand (v. 16) and the seven lampstands (vv. 13, 20). The stars are the angels of the seven churches. In the Bible, the word "angel" can figuratively refer to persons in God's service since, in the Greek, it simply means "messenger" and thus does not refer to heavenly beings alone (Mal. 2:7; 3:1; Matt. 11:10). John's text regarding the angels most likely indicates the respective leaders in the seven churches. Christ held those leaders in His hand as His chosen instruments in the service of the churches, which are symbolized by the seven lampstands that stood with Christ in their midst. Christ gave to John a special message for each of the seven churches (see "The Seven Churches: Application and Organization," p. 1942).

All seven messages have the same organizational structure. Each begins with an address to the "angel" of the church in question followed by an introduction from Jesus. Then the messages outline Jesus's appraisal of the church and give His counsel and warning to it. Finally, each message concludes with an appeal to hear the Spirit and the promises to the overcomers.

Message to the Church in Ephesus

2:1a. Address. The first church that Jesus addressed was in Ephesus (modern-day Selçuk, Turkey), the capital city of the province of Asia. With a population of about a quarter of a million people, Ephesus was an important political, commercial, and religious center. In the city, there were two temples devoted to the worship of the emperor and about fifteen temples devoted to different deities. The grand temple of Artemis attracted multitudes of pilgrims each year for the annual Artemisia festivals. A thriving silversmith business was associated with the temple and contributed to the city's wealth (Acts 19:24–27). It was simultaneously a treasury and a refuge for fleeing criminals while it also played a vital role in community life. The city was famous for magical practices and arts (Acts 19:19) and was notorious for immorality and superstition, yet an influential Christian church was located there. Established by Paul during his three years of ministry in the city (Acts 19), the church grew rapidly and soon became an important center of early Christianity. At the time Revelation was written, the church was still strong in faith. The city was most likely the residence of John prior to and after his exile.

2:1b–4. Description of Christ and Appraisal of the Church. Christ introduced Himself to the church in Ephesus as the One who walks among the seven gold lampstands and who holds the seven stars in His right hand. The Ephesians were given an assurance of Christ's firm presence in the church and His knowledge of their situation and needs when He commended them for having worked hard and demonstrated patient endurance for the sake of the gospel in spite of living in a pagan environment. Despite the external pressure, they had not grown weary and had stood firm in the face of persecution. The church was doctrinally sound and the members did not tolerate evil in their midst. They had tested false apostles and did not tolerate their false teachings (see v. 6).

However, Jesus rebuked the members of this hardworking and faithful church for not continuing to love as they had in the beginning. In their early days, the Ephesians were known for their faithfulness and love (Eph. 1:15), but several decades later, that love had started to fade, just like Israel before the Exile (Jer. 2:2). As the Ephesians emphasized sound doctrine and good works, their love for Christ and their fellow members began to wane. Their works were orthodox, but in the absence of love, they had little value (cf. 1 Cor. 13). Throughout history, Christians have often found themselves torn between strict religious observance and expressing love and compassion. The message to the church in Ephesus is a perennial warning to all Christians whose primary concern is doing right. Christians must always keep in mind the central theme of the gospel: the love of God.

The Seven Churches: Application and Organization

Was John speaking only to the seven churches of Asia Minor, or are these messages of prophetic value to the Christian church throughout history? We suggest that the content of the messages has three potential applications.

1. Historical Application. The seven messages were originally sent to the churches in Asia Minor to help them address the challenges of the pagan environments that were threatening the Christian faith in the first century. It is therefore of the utmost importance to discover how these messages applied to the Christians to whom they were originally sent.

2. Universal Application. Although they were originally written to the churches in Asia Minor, the seven messages speak equally to all Christians in any time and place and have spiritual lessons that can strengthen our relationships with our risen Lord in our journeys of hope.

3. Prophetic Application. The fact that Revelation is a prophetic book (1:3) points to the prophetic significance of these messages. The spiritual conditions of the seven churches correspond remarkably well to the spiritual conditions of Christianity at different points in time. The seven messages were thus intended to provide a panoramic view of Christianity from the first century until the time of the end from heaven's perspective. (See below, "Christian Epochs: Seven Lampstands," which shows the positions of those who divide the messages in terms of historical periods.)

Christian Epochs: Seven Lampstands

Lampstand Church Name	Church Era Characteristic	Suggested Dates
Ephesus	Loveless	(ca. A.D. 31–100)
Smyrna	Persecuted	(ca. A.D. 100–313)
Pergamos	Compromising	(ca. A.D. 313–538)
Thyatira	Corrupt	(ca. A.D. 538–1517)
Sardis	Spiritually dead	(ca. A.D. 1517–1755)
Philadelphia	Faithful	(ca. A.D. 1755–1844)
Laodicea	Lukewarm	(ca. A.D. 1844–End)

2:5–7. Exhortation and Promise. Jesus urged the church, listing three imperatives: First, the Ephesians were to consider (lit., "remember") how far they had fallen (v. 5). The Greek text reads "keep remembering." They had not forgotten the relationship they once had with Christ, but they were failing to keep it in mind in their daily interactions with others. By recalling the ardent love for Christ and for each other they had had when they first accepted the gospel, the members would realize their present spiritual condition. Then it was necessary that they repent (v. 5), which, in the Bible, denotes a radical turnaround in one's life. Jesus called the Ephesians to turn away from their present condition and return to God. Finally, they had to return to doing the works they had done in the beginning (v. 5). Jesus did not urge them to love to the detriment of doing good works. In fact, the revitalization of their first love would result in good works. If the Ephesians would return to their first devotion for Christ, there would be an overflow of love for others. If the church did not reflect the love of God, it would lose the very reason for its existence. Its lampstand would be removed from its place by Jesus.

Christ commended the church for resisting the practices of the Nicolaitans in particular (v. 6). Some early Christian authors have identified the Nicolaitans as followers of Nicolas of Antioch, one of the seven deacons of the Jerusalem church (Acts 6:5) who later fell into heresy. They advocated conformity to pagan practices in order to avoid the discomfort of persecution. In the message to the church in Pergamum (variously translated Pergamos), the Nicolaitans are linked to another heretical group, the Balaamites (Rev. 2:14–15). Several decades earlier, Paul warned the Ephesians of the upcoming apostasy in their midst (Acts 20:29–30), and this prediction was partially fulfilled. However, the church had not yielded to the perverse doctrines of these false teachers, making every effort to preserve the purity of the gospel.

The situation in the Ephesian church aptly corresponds to the general situation and spiritual condition of the church in the first century, beginning with Christ's ascension and enthronement and ending around the beginning of the second century. The early church was characterized by love and faithfulness to the gospel, but by the time John wrote the book of Revelation, the church had begun to lose the fire of its first love, slowly departing from the simplicity and purity of the gospel.

The overcomers in the church were promised the chance to eat from the tree of life in the paradise of God (v. 7). After Adam and Eve sinned, they were forbidden to eat from the tree of life, but those in Ephesus who remained faithful would be allowed to eat from the tree in the restored Garden of Eden (22:2).

2:8–11

Message to the Church in Smyrna

2:8a. Address. The city of Smyrna (modern-day Izmir, Turkey) was situated about thirty-five miles (56 km) northwest of Ephesus. With a population of some two hundred thousand residents, the city rivaled Ephesus in importance. Its trade, surrounding fertile area, and location on the major crossroad to Phrygia and Lydia that formed an important trade route between Greece and Asia made Smyrna a wealthy city. The city was well known for its science and medicine industries, for its famous stadium and library, and for having the largest public theater in the province. Its wealth and exceptional beauty brought the city a reputation of being the "glory" of Asia. Smyrna's special relationship with Rome earned the city many privileges, including the honor of building a temple to honor Tiberius. This made Smyrna a center of emperor worship, which was compulsory for all citizens. An act of loyalty, it was a civic duty for all citizens to go to the temple once a year and burn incense before the statue of the emperor and proclaim, "Caesar is Lord!" The person then received a certificate that allowed him or her to hold a job or conduct business. Those who refused to comply faced persecution and death. Because the Christians in Smyrna didn't participate in emperor worship and other pagan rituals, they faced persecution, the loss of their legal status, and even martyrdom.

2:8b–9. Description of Christ and Appraisal of the Church. Christ introduced Himself to this church as the First and the Last, the One who died and came back to life. These characteristics of Jesus correspond to the situation of the Christians in Smyrna who were going through the hardship of persecution. Jesus understood their situation because He was persecuted to the point of death. He knew the labor and difficulties they faced (Gr. thlipsis, "affliction," "tribulation," denoting a pressure that crushes; v. 9) and knew their poverty as well (Gr. ptōcheia, denoting extreme poverty). Their poverty was related to the persecution they were experiencing. Because of their loyalty to Christ, many members were ostracized and lost their jobs, some suffered imprisonment, and some even martyrdom. However, in spite of their poverty in material goods, the Smyrnians were rich in grace and faith.

Jesus also mentioned the slander of those who claimed to be Jews but who, in reality, were not. Toward the end of the first century, the Jews in Smyrna faced difficulties with the local officials. Since the Romans often identified early Christians as Jews—most of them were Jews—and that brought the ostracization of being a Christian, non-Christian Jews disassociated themselves from Christians by slandering them before the local authorities. Although they considered themselves to be the synagogue of God, these false Jews actually constituted "a synagogue of Satan" (v. 9) because they sought to harm God's people.

2:10–11. Exhortation and Promise. The Christians in Smyrna were in constant fear of the future. Jesus gently admonished them not to fear when He used the present imperative, which showed that the situation was already in progress: "Stop being afraid!" They were about to experience more serious trials and imprisonment for a period of ten days, similar to the ten days of testing that Daniel and his friends endured in Babylon (Dan. 1:12–15). Jesus urged them to remain faithful even to the point of death. If they did, He would give them the crown of life, the crown of victory (Gr. stephanos, denoting the garland given to the winner of the ancient Olympic Games). The crown Jesus promised the faithful in Smyrna is eternal life, and it will be given at the Second Coming (2 Tim. 4:8; James 1:12).

The experience of the church in Smyrna coincides with the severe persecution of Christians throughout the Roman Empire during the second and third centuries and is sometimes called the Age of Martyrdom, the end of which corresponds to the end date of the Diocletian persecution. The "ten days" (2:10) mentioned in the message could be prophetically applied to the notorious persecution initiated by Diocletian and continued (A.D. 303–313) under his successor, Galerius. In this understanding, the church in Smyrna could represent the period in church history beginning in the second century and ending in A.D. 313, when Constantine the Great issued the Edict of Milan and granted Christians religious freedom. The overcomers in Smyrna were promised that they would not be hurt by the second death (v. 11). Physical death is a temporary sleep, and, as such, it is not a final tragedy. The hope of the resurrection overcomes the terror of death. It is the second, eternal death, from which there will be no resurrection, that should be feared (Matt. 10:28).

Message to the Church in Pergamos

2:12a. Address. The city of Pergamos or Pergamum (modern-day Bergama, Turkey), which was about forty-eight miles (77 km) northeast of Smyrna, served as the capital city of the province of Asia for more than two and a half centuries. It was a center of intellectual life in the Hellenistic world, a fact exemplified by its library of nearly two hundred thousand volumes that was the world's largest after the one in Alexandria. The city was also famous for its magnificent temples dedicated to pagan gods. On the acropolis of the city stood the remarkable altar of Zeus, the central portion of which is now exhibited in the Pergamum Museum in Berlin. Near the city stood the immense shrine of Asclepius, the Greek god of healing who was also called "the Savior" and who was represented by a serpent, an emblem retained by the modern medical profession. People came from all over the world to the shrine of Asclepius to be healed. Pergamum was also the first city in Asia to embrace emperor worship, a practice that was compulsory as in Smyrna. Once a year, the citizens were obliged to offer incense before the statue of the emperor and proclaim, "Caesar is Lord."

These things created a difficult situation for the Christians in Pergamum. They were surrounded by paganism and its splendid temples and lived in a climate hostile to their faith. They constantly witnessed the smoke rising from the altar of Zeus that was located above the city and dominated the entire area. They would have heard stories of the miraculous healings at the Asclepeion (the ancient Greek temple dedicated to Asclepius) circulating at a time when Christian miracles were less common. The city was indeed the place Satan's throne was located (2:13).

2:12b–15. Description of Christ and Appraisal of the Church. Jesus introduced Himself to the Christians in Pergamum as the One with the sharp, double-edged sword. The Roman governor in Pergamum had the right to put a person to death, known as the right of the sword. No doubt he used that power against the Christians. However, Jesus assured the church that He alone has the ultimate power over life and death. A human being may claim that power, but the last word belongs to Him. Jesus knew that the Christians in Pergamum lived in the city where Satan dwelled and had situated his throne (v. 13)—in other words, at the very headquarters of Satan's activities—yet most of them remained unwavering in their faithfulness to Christ. They were ostracized for not condoning emperor worship and for not respecting pagan gods and practices. Antipas, a prominent Christian in the church, was even put to death by the Roman authorities for his refusal to comply.

However, there were some who compromised their Christianity with pagan practices, referred to as the Nicolaitans (v. 15) and the ones who adhered to the teachings of Balaam (v. 14). The fact that these two groups are mentioned together suggests that they were related. Just as Balaam seduced the Israelites on the way to the promised land (Num. 31:16), these people were encouraging their fellow Christians to compromise regarding pagan practices—to eat food sacrificed to idols and to commit sexual immorality. While the church in Ephesus staunchly resisted their teachings (see Rev. 2:6), these false teachers clearly won some supporters in the church in Pergamum.

2:16–17. Exhortation and Promise. Jesus encouraged the church members not to compromise their faith with pagan practices. He exhorted them to repent. If they did not turn away from their current course, Christ would come to fight against them with the sword of His mouth (v. 16). As Balaam and those he had seduced were killed by the sword (Num. 31:8), a similar judgment would visit these false teachers. The only way for the Christians in Pergamum to avoid the impending judgment was to make a decisive turnaround in their relationship with Christ.

The church of Pergamum aptly represents the situation of the Christian church during the period following the ending of the Diocletian persecution and preceding the issuing of the Edict of Milan. Just as Christianity finally persevered in its struggle against paganism, many in the church went the way of compromise. Although many remained unwavering and faithful to the gospel, the fourth through sixth centuries witnessed spiritual decline and apostasy as the church wrestled with the temptation of compromise.

The overcomers in Pergamum who refused to participate in pagan practices were promised the chance to eat the hidden manna, the food of angels (v. 17; Ps. 78:25). Due to their refusal to participate in emperor worship, they were deprived of the certificates with their names on them issued by the Roman governor. In the place of a temporal certificate, Jesus promised them a white stone with a new name engraved on it that would entitle them to special privileges that surpassed any pleasure of pagan life.

2:18–29

Message to the Church in Thyatira

2:18a. Address. Thyatira (modern-day Akhisar, Turkey), located about thirty-eight miles (61 km) southeast of Pergamum, was the smallest and least important of the seven cities addressed in Revelation. It had no political importance or cultural significance, though the city was known for many trades. Lydia, the purple fabrics dealer in Philippi and the first Christian convert in Europe, was from Thyatira (Acts 16:14). Unlike the well-situated residents of the previous three cities, the residents of Thyatira were mainly poor laborers and tradespeople. In order to run a business or hold a job, a person had to belong to a trade guild, each of which had a patron god. Guild members were expected to attend the guild festivals that honored the patron god, at which participants became drunk, shared a common meal in the temple that included meat sacrificed to the patron god, and often engaged in immoral activities with temple prostitutes at the festival's end. A refusal to participate in these festivals resulted in expulsion from the trade guilds, which further resulted in the hardships of social isolation and economic sanctions. The danger to the Christians in this city came directly from these trade guilds, because they could not join them without participating in the guild festivals.

2:18b–23. Description of Christ and Appraisal of the Church. Christ introduced Himself to this church as the Son of God, whose eyes blazed as fire and whose feet shone like polished bronze. While Jesus appeared to John as a Son of Man (1:13), He came as the Son of God to the church in Thyatira. His flaming eyes denoted His penetrating ability to see into the innermost part (see Rev. 2:23), and His feet, which looked like exquisite brass, symbolized His uncompromising stance against the seductive influences that affected the church.

Jesus described Thyatira as a loving, faithful, service-oriented, and persevering church. Unlike the church in Ephesus, whose love was fading, this church is noted for an increase in faith and love, their later endeavors being more than their first ones (v. 19). In the Bible, love and faith go together (Gal. 5:6; Eph. 1:15; 1 Thess. 3:6). Furthermore, service is an outcome of love (1 Thess. 1:3) and perseverance a product of faith (Col. 1:23; 2 Thess. 1:3–4).

The problem was that the church tolerated the teaching of an influential woman in their midst. Jesus names her Jezebel, after the notorious wife of King Ahab who led all Israel into apostasy (1 Kin. 16:31–33). This woman claimed to be a prophetess who had a direct message from God saying it was fine for Christians to engage in sexual immorality and to eat food sacrificed to idols in order to avoid social isolation from the trade guilds (v. 20). Her influence led many in the church into compromise and apostasy.

Jezebel is referred to as a spiritual harlot because of her seductive advocacy for compromise with paganism, such as engaging in sexual immorality. All those who condoned her teachings were committing spiritual adultery with her (v. 22). Jesus used such severe language because He wanted to impress on the Christians' minds the gravity of their actions. Since harlots' activities take place in bed, the bed was the place where Jezebel and those in adulterous relationships with her would be judged. If they did not repent, Jesus would throw them together into terrible suffering. A similar fate would come on Jezebel's offspring, who would follow in her footsteps.

God's judgment on Jezebel was designed to demonstrate to all the churches that Christ is the One who searches minds (the seat of intelligence) and hearts (the seat of emotions) and that God alone possesses that ability (Jer. 17:10). With his penetrating flame-like eyes (see Rev. 2:18), Christ is able to see what is in human hearts; and as an impartial judge, He will give to each according to his or her works.

2:24–29. Exhortation and Promise. Not all members of the church sided with Jezebel; there was a remnant that refused to become familiar with the deep things of Satan. Jezebel offered the members arcane teachings, and her teachings were diabolically deep. In the OT, the phrase "to know" denotes an experiential knowledge; as such, it is used here to refer to sexual relations (Gen. 4:1; 19:5). This remnant had not been involved in spiritual adultery with Jezebel in exchange for a chance to experience the depth of Satan's deceptive teachings. Jesus promised to place on them no other burden than to hold firmly to what they had received thus far (vv. 24–25).

The situation in the church in Thyatira applies to the condition of the church at large during the Middle Ages. The danger to the church did not come from outside but from those within who claimed to receive their authority from God. During that period, tradition replaced the Bible, a human priesthood and sacred relics replaced Christ's priesthood, and works were regarded as meritorious. Those who did not condone the corrupting influences of the institutional church experienced severe persecution and even death.

Jesus promised a share in His victory to the ones in Thyatira who would remain faithful to Him. He would give them dominion over the nations (v. 26), just as He had received authority from the Father (v. 27). He would also give them "the morning star" (v. 28), which is a symbol of Jesus Christ Himself (22:16). In other words, Jesus promised the greatest gift to those who would remain faithful: Himself.

Message to the Church in Sardis

3:1a. Address. The city of Sardis (modern-day Sart, Turkey), which was about thirty miles (48 km) southeast of Thyatira, had a splendid history. Some six centuries prior to the book of Revelation, Sardis had been one of the greatest cities in the ancient world. It was the capital of the kingdom of Lydia, ruled by the wealthy Croesus until he was defeated by Cyrus of Persia. By the Roman period, the city had lost its prestige in the ancient world. While continuing to enjoy prosperity and wealth, the city's glory and pride was rooted in its past history rather than in its present reality. It was known as a trading center for the wool, dyeing, and garment-making industries, providing its residents with a luxurious lifestyle. The city's patron deity was the goddess Cybele, whose temple hosted eunuch priests. The goddess was believed to possess the special power of restoring the dead to life.

The city was built on the peak of a steep hill. Due to its location, it was a natural citadel, as it was accessible by only one route and was therefore easy to defend. As a result, the citizens were so overconfident in their safety that the city walls were guarded carelessly, if at all. The city was captured by surprise twice, first by Cyrus the Persian (549 B.C.) and later by Antiochus III (218 B.C.). On both occasions, enemy soldiers climbed the precipice at night and found that the Sardinians had not posted a guard on the walls. The city was taken and destroyed because of the overconfidence of its citizens and the failure of the guards to keep watch.

3:1b–1c. Description of Christ and Appraisal of the Church. Jesus introduced Himself to the church in Sardis as the One who had the seven spirits of God and the seven stars. He came to the members of this church with the fullness of the Holy Spirit to awaken them from their lifeless slumber. The church in Sardis received only a rebuke from Jesus. The members were not blamed for specific sins or heresy but for being lifeless. Its reputation claimed that it was alive, but in reality, it was spiritually dead. Their works did not measure up to God's standard; He found them lacking and imperfect (v. 2). Their underlying issue was spiritual complacency and lethargy. Their compromise with the pagan environment had killed their spiritual life and their ability or motivation to witness for the gospel.

3:2–6. Exhortation and Promise. Jesus exhorted the Christians in Sardis to be alert and to strengthen those who still had some life in them but were about to die (v. 2). Like the Ephesians, they needed to remember what they had received and heard, namely, the gospel in the beginning of their Christian experience, and to cling to it and repent (v. 3). This would result in turning from their present lethargic condition and experiencing a new beginning in their relationship with Christ. However, Jesus warned that if they did not wake up and keep watch in their spiritual lives, He would come unexpectedly to them in judgment, like a thief. Their destiny was to mirror the past history of the city: as Sardis was unexpectedly conquered twice because of a lack of vigilance, so Christ would visit the church in unanticipated judgment of its spiritual lethargy.

There were some Christians in Sardis who were still unwavering in their faithfulness to Christ and who had avoided compromising with paganism (v. 4). However, they were a minority group in the church and even they were dying (see v. 2). Jesus promised that they would walk with Him dressed in white clothes, for they were worthy (see 7:9). The white robes they would receive correlate to their faithfulness to Christ.

The message to the church in Sardis corresponds to the condition of the church in two periods of time: the Reformation and especially the post-Reformation era known as Protestant scholasticism. The vibrant generation of Reformers rediscovered the gospel that had been forgotten during the medieval period and put the Bible into the hands of the people, rejuvenating Christianity. Unfortunately, once the Reformers passed away, lifeless formalism began to invade the church. The Reformers' successors became overly involved in doctrinal polemics and controversies, gradually degenerating into a state of spiritual lethargy. Under the influence of the rising tide of rationalism and secularism, focus on the saving grace of the gospel and commitment to Christ waned, giving way to rationalism and theological arguments. The church at this period, although appearing to be alive, was in reality spiritually dead.

Jesus promised that the overcomers in the church would be dressed in white clothes (3:5), which reaffirms the promise made in the previous verse. Those who would keep their garments undefiled from the pagan environment would walk with Jesus in white robes. Jesus also promised not to erase their names from the Book of Life but to acknowledge their names before the Father and His angels (v. 5; cf. Matt. 10:32).

Message to the Church in Philadelphia

3:7a. Address. The city of Philadelphia (modern-day Alasehir, Turkey) was located about twenty-five miles (40 km) southeast of Sardis and was the youngest of the seven cities mentioned in Revelation. The city was founded by Attalus II Philadelphus, the king of Pergamum, who named the city Philadelphia ("brotherly love") after the love he had for his younger brother Eumenes II. The city stood on the imperial trade road that connected all parts east of the province with all parts west of it. From its foundation, it was intended to serve as a missionary city for promoting the Greek language and culture to the area of Lydia and Phrygia.

3:7b–10. Description of Christ and Appraisal of the Church. Jesus presented Himself to the church in Philadelphia as He who is holy and true (v. 7). The Holy One is a reference to God in the OT (Is. 43:15; Hab. 3:3), and Jesus is the True One (see Rev. 19:11). The church may therefore rely on Him completely. Jesus also declared that He had the key of David; when He opens a door, no one can shut it, and when He shuts a door, no one can open it. This description of Jesus goes back to Isaiah 22:22, which talks about Eliakim, king Hezekiah's chief steward, who was entrusted with the key of the royal palace and thus exercised the full authority of the king. Jesus presented Himself to the church as the One with full authority and access to the heavenly storehouse. This is why He is able to make great promises to His people.

The church in Philadelphia did not receive any rebuke from Jesus. He declared that He knew the members' works: they had kept His word and had not denied His name (v. 8). Like the Christians in Smyrna, they suffered from Jewish opposition. Even though these Jews claimed that they were serving God, Jesus identified them as actually belonging to the synagogue of Satan (3:9; cf. 2:8–9). However, Jesus assured the church that He was already dealing with its opponents. The day was coming when those who harmed the Christians would be forced to admit that God was with them. Although faithful, the church in Philadelphia had little strength (v. 8). Similar to the situation of the church in Sardis, the appealing influence of the pagan environment had greatly impacted Christians' spiritual lives. Yet as weak as they were, Christ promised to set before them an open door of opportunities that no one could shut (v. 8). Because they had consistently kept His command to persevere in their eyes, Jesus promised to preserve them during the "hour of trial" that would come to test everyone dwelling on the earth (v. 10), which in Revelation is a code for the wicked. This time of trials was to be God's judgments of the seven last plagues (chaps. 15–16). Jesus promised to be with His faithful people and to protect them during this time of tribulation.

The church in Philadelphia coincides with the condition of Christianity during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. This period was characterized by a great revival of Protestantism. Various movements, often identified as the First and Second Great Awakenings (including the Wesleys' Methodist and Millerite movements), revitalized genuine faith in the saving grace of Christ that resulted in restoring the spirit of Christian fellowship and self-sacrifice. The church of this period was driven by a genuine desire to carry the gospel to the whole world. As a result, there was a great proclamation of the gospel as never before experienced in Christian history.

3:10–13. Exhortation and Promise. Jesus, who is coming soon, exhorted the Philadelphians to hold on to what they had, meaning the spark of faithfulness that was still burning, so that no one, whether people or Satan himself, could take their crown (stephanos, "the crown of victory"; see Rev. 2:10). Jesus promised that overcomers would be permanent pillars in the temple in the new Jerusalem with the names of God, the new Jerusalem, and Christ on them. Pillars in the earthly temple provided stability and permanence, and in the NT, they are a symbol of the church (1 Tim. 3:15). Promised to always be in God's presence, the faithful would serve God in His temple and He would dwell among them (Rev. 7:15).

Message to the Church in Laodicea

3:14a. Address. The city of Laodicea (modern-day Eskihisar, Turkey) was located about forty miles (64 km) southeast of Philadelphia. It was situated near the cities of Hierapolis and Colossae on the major trade route between Ephesus and Syria. Because of its favorable location, the city came to be one of the greatest commercial and financial centers of the ancient world. Laodicea was enormously wealthy due to its clothing manufacturing industry, its banking transactions, and its status as a great banking center where an enormous quantity of gold was stored. It was also famous for its medical school, which was renowned throughout the ancient world for its treatment of eye diseases by means of an ointment made from "Phrygian powder" mixed with oil.

The commercial, financial, and industrial prosperity filled the wealthy residents of Laodicea with a spirit of pride. When the city was devastated by an earthquake around A.D. 60, its residents proudly refused imperial help and rebuilt the city using their own resources. However, for all its prosperity, the city had a great problem with water. Aqueducts that stretched for many miles supplied the city with water from the hot springs near Hierapolis and probably Colossae. The latter was known for its cold mountain water; but by the time the water reached the city, it would have become lukewarm in the aqueduct.

3:14b–17. Description of Christ and Appraisal of the Church. Jesus presented Himself to the church in Laodicea as the Amen, the Faithful and True Witness, and the Ruler and Originator of God's creation (v. 14). The word "amen" comes from Hebrew and means "in truth." In the OT, God is called true (Heb. 'amen; Is. 65:16), which relates to how Christ's discerning testimony exposed the true condition of the church in Laodicea. His ability to create out of nothing was the only hope for this half-hearted and lukewarm church.

The Laodicean church was in such poor condition that Jesus had nothing positive to say about it. The members were not charged with a specific sin, apostasy, or heresy, but no other church received such a rebuke. Jesus likened their condition to the city's water supply. They were neither cold nor hot, but lukewarm. As such, Jesus warned that He was about to spew them from His mouth (v. 16). The proud spirit of the city had pervaded the members of the church; they reflected the complacency of the city that prided itself on its accomplishments and wealth. They viewed themselves as being rich and in need of nothing (v. 17), regarding their wealth as divine favor just as Ephraim did in the OT (Hos. 12:8). In contrast to the Christians in Smyrna, who were materially poor but spiritually rich, the Laodiceans were wealthy and yet wretched, miserably pitiful, poor, blind, and naked (Gr. ptōchos, denoting extreme poverty). The irony is that they lived in a city famous for eye salve while they remained spiritually blind. Their pride prevented them from seeing themselves as they truly were.

3:18–22. Exhortation and Promise. Jesus counseled the church to buy three things from Him: First, He offered gold refined in the fire (v. 18), which symbolized a proven faith that could last until the end (1 Pet. 1:7) and would make the Laodiceans truly rich. Second, Jesus offered them white garments to cover their wretched condition, symbolizing salvation (Is. 61:10; Rev. 7:9–10). To be dressed in white and clean garments means to be in a right relationship with God (Rev. 3:4–5). Third, Jesus offered them salve to anoint their eyes, so that they might see their true spiritual condition (Eph. 1:18). That Jesus gave them the opportunity to buy all these things from Him shows that it was necessary for the Laodiceans to give up their pride and complacency in order to receive riches from Christ.

However, Christ was not giving up on this church. As bad as they were, He loved the Laodiceans. However, this love was expressed through rebuke and discipline (v. 19), since God disciplines us so that we will not be condemned along with the world (1 Cor. 11:32; cf. Prov. 3:12). Christ made every effort to make this church realize its condition and break the chains of self-sufficiency that held it down. The only escape for the Laodiceans was through genuine repentance: turning away from their complacency and making a fresh start.

Jesus concluded His appeal to this church by depicting Himself standing at the door and knocking, a picture that mirrors the lover in the Song of Songs as he knocked at the door of his beloved and pleaded with her to let him in (Song 5:2–6). The whole church had been admonished up to this point, but here, Jesus began addressing individuals in the church. All those who would open the door and welcome Him in would have an intimate, loving dinner with Him, an act that refers to an intimate relationship.

The church in Laodicea represents the spiritual condition of the church today. Furthermore, the strong verbal links with the warning given in Revelation 16:15 shows that the message to the church in Laodicea represents the church at the time of the end. This last church exists in a peculiar time of great political, religious, and secular upheavals and faces unique challenges, yet it is self-sufficient and lukewarm, struggling with its authenticity. Christ's warning to this church has a far-reaching implication for all in the church at the close of this earth's history.

Jesus promised to share His throne with the overcomers in the church just as He overcame and shared His Father's throne (v. 21). It is particularly significant that while the number of promises to the other churches increased in proportion to their spiritual decline, Laodicea was given only one promise. However, this promise incorporates all of the promises given to the churches, since it ensures permanent union with Christ in the presence of the Father.

THE SEVEN SEALS

Chapter 4 begins a new section of Revelation as the scene shifts from earth to heaven and from John's day to a near and distant future (4:1). There is also a shift in language. While the seven messages are written in straightforward language with which the meaning of the infrequently used symbols can generally be easily understood, from this point on, the book employs complex symbolic language reminiscent of Jewish apocalyptic literature. The section begins with a vision of the heavenly throne room (4:1—5:14), followed by the opening of the first six seals (6:1–17). Before the seventh seal is opened (8:1), there is an interposed description of the sealing of the saints (7:1–17).

4:1–11

The Heavenly Throne Room

This scene has been interpreted in different ways throughout the years. The view set forth here corresponds well with the imagery and language used by John and the overall message of the book of Revelation. Before the future history was revealed to John, he was given a glimpse of Christ's inauguration into His post-resurrection ministry in heaven. Revelation 4–5 thus provides heaven's perspective on the meaning of the future events recorded in the book.

4:1–3. A Door into the Heavenly Throne Room. John was transported in vision to heaven, where he saw a door standing open. The trumpet-like voice of Jesus (see commentary on Rev. 1:9–20) invited him to come up, so that he could be shown what would happen after the time of the seven churches (see 1:19). Having witnessed the situation in the church of his day, John was then to be shown the panoramic survey of history from his time until Christ's return. Through that door, John was able to look into the heavenly temple. What first caught his attention was the majestic throne on which God the Father sat. John did not attempt to describe God, focusing instead on His radiant glory. Paul reminds us that God dwells in unapproachable light (1 Tim. 6:16), and the OT speaks often of the splendid glory surrounding the Father (Ps. 104:2; Ezek. 1:26–28), which is impossible to capture in human language. John described it in terms of the dazzling glow of precious stones: jasper, sardius (carnelian or ruby), and emerald (Rev. 4:3). In the ancient world, these three stones were considered to be representative in nature. Exodus refers to sardius and jasper as the first and last stones on the breastplate of the high priest, representing Reuben as the eldest and Benjamin as the youngest of Jacob's sons. The emerald was the fourth stone on the breastplate, representing Judah (Ex. 28:17–21).

The flashing brilliance of the precious stones produced a rainbow that surrounded the throne, similar to the one Ezekiel witnessed in a vision centuries earlier (Ezek. 1:28). The rainbow functions as the sign of God's covenant (Gen. 9:12–17). The precious stones and the rainbow are intended to provide an assurance of God's covenant promise to His people and of His faithfulness to that promise.

4:4. The Twenty-Four Elders. John saw twenty-four other thrones, with twenty-four elders sitting on them, arranged in a circle around God's throne. They were all clothed in white robes and wore crowns of gold. The identity of these elders is a matter of discussion. Some consider them to be heavenly beings, while others consider them to be human beings. The description of the elders suggests that they are probably human beings—glorified saints (see below, "Identity of the Twenty-Four Elders"). In the vision, they were part of the heavenly council that was meeting to participate in Christ's enthronement ceremony.

Identity of the Twenty-Four Elders

While the possibility that the elders were heavenly figures who had representative functions as members of the heavenly council cannot be excluded completely, there are several arguments for identifying them as glorified human beings. First, the title "elders" in the Bible is used always for humans. They sat on thrones, as human overcomers are promised (Rev. 3:21), in contrast to angels, who always stand in God's presence. They appeared in the vision wearing white robes, the attire of God's faithful people (3:4–5; 6:11; 7:9). The crowns on their heads were the victory crowns (Gr. stephanoi) reserved exclusively for the victorious saints (2:10; 3:11). John presents their symbolic number as consisting of two sets of twelve. He later depicts the new Jerusalem as having twelve gates named after the twelve tribes of Israel and twelve foundations named after the twelve apostles (21:12–14). The twenty-four elders in the vision could thus represent God's people from both the OT and the NT, the church in its totality.

In the OT temple, there were twenty-four divisions of priests who took turns in the temple services (1 Chr. 24:4–19). Each division had a "leader" (1 Chr. 24:4), and in Jewish tradition, these chief priests were called "elders." Throughout Revelation, the activities of the twenty-four elders are presented as continuous worship (Rev. 5:8–10; 19:4), resembling the work of the priests in the earthly temple.

The twenty-four elders had never before been mentioned in any biblical record of visions of the throne of God. This indicates that when John saw them, they were a new group who had not previously been present in the heavenly throne room. They must have arrived shortly before the scene was set up. If the view that they were humans is correct, then they were most likely the ones raised from the dead at the time of Jesus's death (Matt. 27:51–53). Paul states that when Jesus ascended to heaven, He took a host with Him (Eph. 4:8). It is therefore possible that the twenty-four elders ascended with Jesus as the representatives of humanity, to witness God's fairness in His actions and to participate in the heavenly judgment. Here, in the vision, they were ushered into the heavenly throne room to witness the exaltation of Christ to the heavenly throne at the right hand of the Father.

4:5–6a. The Throne of God. The throne was central to everything that took place in the scene; it is featured seventeen times in chapters 4–5, and everything in the throne room is portrayed in relation to the throne: around the throne (4:3, 4, 6; 5:11), from the throne (4:5), in front of the throne (4:5–6, 10), or in the midst or center of the throne (4:6; 5:6). The centrality of the throne in the vision is fundamental to the theology of the entire scene. The throne of God represents His ruling authority over the universe—an authority that is challenged by a usurping enemy power (13:2; 16:10). The central issue in the ongoing conflict between God and Satan is who has the right to rule. Revelation 4–5 portrays a decisive event in that conflict: the exaltation of Christ to the heavenly throne as a result of His sacrificial death on the cross of Calvary.

The account presents lightning flashes, rumbling voices, and thunderclaps from the throne that accentuate the splendor of the occasion. The scene evokes the memory of the presence of God giving of the law at Mount Sinai (Ex. 19:16; 20:18) when Israel, having been rescued from Egypt, was inaugurated as the people of God, "a kingdom of priests" (19:4–6). In a similar fashion, John observed Christ, as the slain Lamb (5:6), having redeemed humanity by His blood, receiving the sealed scroll from God and inaugurating the redeemed into a royal priesthood (Rev. 5:9–10).

Before the throne were seven lamps of fire that symbolized the Holy Spirit as the second member of the Godhead. The reference to the seven spirits of God denotes the fullness and universality of the work of the Holy Spirit in the church (1:4) and the world (5:6), as seven is a number of fullness. John also saw before the throne a flat expanse that appeared to him like a sea of glass (cf. Ex. 24:10; Ezek. 1:22).

4:6b–7. The Four Living Creatures. On each side of the throne there were "four living creatures" that faced the four directions of the universe. Their appearance resembled the heavenly beings in Ezekiel's vision of the throne of God (Ezek. 1:5–14; 10:12–15), in which the four living creatures are identified as cherubs (10:20–22) that have four faces and four wings each (1:6). In Revelation, they are identified as having six wings (Rev. 4:8) like the seraphs in Isaiah's vision (Is. 6:2).

The four living beings were therefore the exalted angels who serve God as His agents and as the guardians of His throne, as is evidenced in how the Bible often portrays God as sitting on the throne between the cherubim (2 Kin. 19:15; Ps. 80:1; 99:1; Is. 37:16). The depiction of the four living creatures in Revelation is symbolic. Their wings (Rev. 4:8) point to their swiftness in carrying out God's orders, and their eyes represent their intelligence and discernment. Their appearances in terms of a lion, a calf (Gr. moschos, variously translated "ox"), a man, and a flying eagle represent the entire order of creation. Revelation presents them as constantly leading the heavenly hosts in praising God (4:8–9; 5:8–9; 7:11–12; 19:4) and being involved in the execution of God's judgments on the earth (6:1, 3, 5, 7; 15:7).

4:8–11. Heavenly Worship. John next describes the heavenly liturgy in the throne room. He saw that it started with the acclamation of praises by the four exalted angels (v. 8), who echoed the praises of the seraphim in Isaiah's vision (Is. 6:1–3). The threefold repetition of "holy" emphasizes God's holiness and omnipotence as manifested in the past, the present, and the future. John presents their praise as being followed on every occasion by the response of the twenty-four elders (v. 11), who fall to the ground and lay their crowns before the throne, honoring God as Creator and Lord who has all power, honor, and glory. With their praise, the elders recognized God as the Creator of all things to whom every created being owes its life.

John also presents their praise as emphatically stressing Christ's act of redemption (5:8–10), which is in accordance with the fact that the worship scene in Revelation 4–5 points to two things: creation (chap. 4) and redemption (chap. 5). In short, it shows that the essence of true worship is to recount and celebrate God's mighty acts of creation and redemption. God, who created the world, also has the power and ability to restore it by providing eternal salvation for lost humanity.

Revelation 4:8–10 suggests that what John saw is something that occurs regularly in heaven (v. 9) and was not a singular event that took place at a specific point in time. Furthermore, the OT visions of God often show Him seated on His throne and being worshiped by countless heavenly beings (Is. 6:1–3; Ezek. 1:22–28; Dan. 7:9–10). However, the scene in chapter 4 is preparation for the splendid occasion that occurs in the following chapter.

5:1–14
The Enthronement of Christ

Revelation 5 continues the throne room scene of the vision as the heavenly worship suddenly stops and the focus of the heavenly assembly in its entirety turns back toward the heavenly throne. Some Adventist interpreters argue that Revelation 5 describes a judgment scene. The interpretation offered here is based on a close examination of the biblical text in its literary context, the structure of the whole book, and the OT history behind the scene.

Enthronement Scene

Revelation 5 describes one of the most significant events in the history of the Great Controversy: Christ's enthronement and inauguration into His post-Calvary ministry as our King and Priest in the heavenly sanctuary after His ascension to heaven. This whole scene was described according to the enthronement of the kings of Israel in the OT. The Israelite kings were required, at their enthronement, to provide for themselves a scroll of the law, the covenant scroll, to read and obey (Deut. 17:18–20). In later Israelite history, the covenant scroll was presented to the newly crowned king as the royal emblem, as was the case for King Joash (2 Kin. 11:12). After taking the scroll, the newly crowned king would sit on the throne and begin his reign.

The possession of the covenant scroll and the ability to open and read it demonstrated the king's right to rule. Placed before the royal throne, the scroll functioned as the constitution of the kingdom and provided instructions for the life of the nation. It also specified the covenant terms and conditions of God's promises to His people. The king was to read it regularly, obey it, and educate the people regarding its contents. In this role, the Israelite king was the covenant mediator and guardian of God's law in the land. After the Babylonian exile, the Jews no longer had a king from the line of David on the throne in Jerusalem. People hoped and longed for the coming of the Messiah, who would be from the Davidic line and who would sit on the throne of Israel and rule with justice (Jer. 23:5–6; Ezek. 37:24–28).

The seven-sealed scroll of Revelation 5 is symbolically comparable to the covenant scroll of the law that was handed to the Israelite kings at their enthronement. To take it symbolized the right to sit on the throne and reign. To unfold the scroll meant to unfold God's plan of salvation for fallen humanity. Jesus, as God, was worthy of sitting on the throne in heaven at the right hand of the Father and, as the eschatological Sovereign, of bringing the history of sin on this planet to an end.

The sealed scroll that symbolized the plan of salvation, also known as the covenant book, was here handed to the triumphant Christ, the long-awaited messianic King of Davidic lineage. In this scenario, by taking His seat on the throne at the right hand of the Father (Ps. 110:1) along with the scroll, Christ was made the rightful King of the earth. What was lost with Adam has now been regained. All authority and sovereignty were given to Christ (Matt. 28:18), who will be coronated on the earth after the Millennium in the sight of all the righteous and wicked (immediately prior to the final and permanent destruction of the wicked), so that what happened in heaven in A.D. 31 (i.e., Jesus's enthronement and subsequent sending of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost) will be affirmed before earth's inhabitants.

As Jesus was inaugurated into His post-Calvary ministry, fallen human beings were given free access to God through Him. The work of the Holy Spirit is now unlimited in applying Christ's victorious death to the lives of human beings and to announcing God's kingdom throughout the earth. By Christ receiving the scroll, the destiny of all humanity was placed into His hands. His ability to break the seals and open the scroll entitle Him to carry out the plan of salvation to its ultimate realization. While earlier in the book, the Holy Spirit is presented as being regularly before the throne (1:4; 4:5), here we see Him sent out into the earth. This activity correlates with the enthronement of Christ after His ascension to heaven ten days before Pentecost (Acts 2:32–36). When Jesus was enthroned at the right hand of the Father, the Holy Spirit descended on the disciples in fulfillment of the promise Jesus had made to them.

5:1. The Seven-Sealed Scroll. John next noticed a scroll lying on the throne at the right hand of God. The attention of the heavenly assembly was focused on it. The Greek word biblion denotes a scroll rather than a codex (see Rev. 6:14), and the Greek text epi tēn dexian clearly shows that the scroll was not "in" the right hand of God, as various Bible translations suggest, but at the right hand of God. The person who would take the scroll was supposed to take His place on the throne.

The scroll is described as an opisthograph, a document with text on both sides. As such, it evokes the imagery of the two tablets with text on both sides that Moses brought down from Sinai (Ex. 32:15) as well as the scroll Ezekiel saw in vision that contained the impending judgments against Israel (Ezek. 2:9–10). These similarities suggest that the scroll of Revelation 5 was related to a prophetic revelation of the future and God's covenant with His people.

The scroll is described as being sealed with seven seals. In ancient times, to protect a document from tampering, the scroll was rolled up and tied with a cord and the seal was impressed on blobs of clay or wax over the knots. In John's day, the practice of sealing documents with more than one seal was not uncommon. The sealed scroll could not be opened nor its contents disclosed until all of the seals were broken by an authorized person. The scroll in Revelation 5 was sealed for the obvious purpose of concealing its contents.

The act of sealing in Daniel and Revelation denotes a concealment of God's revelation until the appointed time (Dan. 12:4, 9; Rev. 10:4). Revelation 10:7 shows that the meaning of the sealed scroll is related to the concept of "the mystery of God" regarding God's purpose in solving the problem of sin, saving fallen humanity, and establishing His eternal kingdom. The sealed scroll functions as a symbolic reference to the divine plan of salvation. It would be officially unsealed on the breaking of the seventh seal (8:1) at the sound of the seventh trumpet (11:15) at the Second Coming, when the plan of salvation would be consummated (see commentary on Rev. 10:1–11).

5:2–4. The Crisis in the Throne Room. In John's vision, a mighty angel challenged the assembly by asking who was worthy to open the scroll and break its seals (v. 2). In order to take the scroll from the throne, open it, and read its contents, the worthy one must have unique qualifications. In John's day, "worthiness" denoted distinctive qualifications based on outstanding achievements. In Revelation 4:11, the twenty-four elders' responsive proclamation to the angel's challenge stated that only God is worthy to reign over the universe on the basis of His creative power. Thus, the taking and opening of the scroll required the unique qualification of divinity. No created being in the universe fulfills such a qualification.

This lack of worthiness caused John great sorrow and he cried many tears (v. 4). His weeping represents the tears of all God's people, from Adam to the conclusion of the Great Controversy and the end of time. Humanity became lost and hopeless at the Fall. The sealed scroll contained the record of the cosmic conflict and its resolution. Since only the slain Lamb could open the scroll (vv. 6–14), the act of breaking the seals was tied to the plan of salvation; once opened, God's plan for the salvation of fallen humanity could be explained and consummated.

5:5–6. Worthiness of Christ. The fact that the elder declared Jesus to be "the Lion of the tribe of Judah" (v. 5) is significant because it refers to what Jesus did as king: He conquered. Furthermore, Jesus was fully qualified to take the scroll and reign on the throne because of who He is. The expression "the Root of David" is used in the OT to refer to the promise of the coming Messiah, the Anointed One, who would be worthy of sitting on the throne of David and of ruling over God's people and would thus have come from the tribe of Judah and the lineage of David.

When John turned to see the Lion, however, he saw a living slain Lamb instead. While the figure of the Lion refers to what Jesus did, the figure of the Lamb shows how He did it: His sacrificial death on the cross. Christ's victory on the cross made Him eligible to take the scroll of the covenant, break its seals, and share the heavenly throne with the Father (3:21).

Christ the Lamb is described as having seven horns and seven eyes. Seven is the number of fullness. The seven horns denote Jesus's full authority to rule over the universe and take the scroll, and the seven eyes signify the fullness of His discernment and intelligence that allow Him to read and instruct His people. These two sevens are particularly significant in light of the fact that the scroll was sealed with seven seals. The seven horns and eyes are believed to be the seven spirits of God that were sent out into all the earth and that denote the fullness of the activity of the Holy Spirit in the world.

5:7–14. The Enthronement of Christ. Christ the Lamb, following the manner and tradition of the Israelite kings, took the scroll. The four living creatures and the twenty-four elders fell down before Him in worship as in Revelation 4:9–10, exclaiming, "You are worthy to take the scroll," so as to open its seals as the One who was slain (5:9). By this act, the exalted angels, the living creatures, and the elders validated Christ's sacrifice on behalf of humanity. By His blood, He paid the ransom for fallen human beings all over the world and redeemed them for God, giving them a kingdom and priesthood (5:9–10). While the former two were accomplished on the cross, the latter will be realized at the Second Coming of Christ (20:4–6).

By taking the scroll, Christ was made the rightful King over His creation. John saw that the four living creatures and the twenty-four elders were joined by the countless angelic hosts in surrounding the throne and addressing royal praises to the newly enthroned King (5:11–12). After this, all creation in heaven and on earth joined together in offering royal adoration to both the Father and Christ (v. 13). The fact that this praise was offered to both the Father and Christ shows that they were jointly seated as co-rulers on the heavenly throne (3:21). The praise of the heavenly beings was met with an "amen" (meaning "truly"; v. 14) by the four living creatures and the prostration of the twenty-four elders, thus confirming the truth of their joint rulership.

As with the seven churches (chaps. 2–3), there is also a general correlation between the seven seals and different epochs in Christian history. The breaking of the seals began with the enthronement of Christ at Pentecost in A.D. 31 and will end with the Second Coming. Chapter 6 thus encompasses the history of the Christian church from the first century until the return of Christ.

Understanding the Seals

The events triggered by the breaking of the seven seals must be understood in the context of the OT covenant curses described in terms of sword, famine, plagues, and wild animals (Lev. 26:21–26). In Ezekiel, they are referred to as God's four judgments (Ezek. 14:21), and in Jeremiah, four kinds of destruction (Jer. 15:2–3). These plagues were the disciplinary judgments by which God chastised His people when they became unfaithful to the covenant. There are some minor differences in the interpretation of the seals among Adventist historicists. What is set forth here is a biblically viable interpretation simultaneously acknowledging that others may understand the events somewhat differently.

There is also a close correlation between the seven seals and Jesus's apocalyptic discourse on the Mount of Olives, in which Jesus explained to the disciples what would happen throughout history, up to the end (Matt. 24). The parallels between the seals and Matthew 24 suggest that the seven seals are the means by which God keeps His people on the right track by reminding them of the reality of Christ's return. The seals are opened in the throne room in chapters 4 and 5 and thus continue the established theme in which the seals can be opened only by the slain Lamb. In this way, the opening of each seal is tied to both redemption and salvation.

The First Seal

Revelation 6 builds on chapter 5. Christ could take the sealed scroll because of His place on the heavenly throne as the legitimate ruler of the earth, an important event that took place at Pentecost (Acts 2:32–36) in A.D. 31. Pentecost marks the beginning of the spreading of the gospel throughout the world. With the proclamation of the gospel, Christ expanded His kingdom by winning human hearts to Himself. After taking the scroll, Christ began to break its seven seals.

As Christ the Lamb opened each of the first four seals, John heard one of the four livings beings commanding a horse and its horseman to appear on the scene (Rev. 6:1, 3, 5, 7). Some translations imply that the command was given to John, but it appears that this is not the case. As the first seal was opened, a white horse appeared on the scene. The white color is a symbol of purity and is regularly associated with Christ and His followers. The horse's rider held a bow, a detail pointing to how God is sometimes pictured in the OT as riding a horse with a bow in His hand, conquering the enemies of His people (Ps. 45:4–5; Hab. 3:8–13). Revelation 19:11–16 portrays Christ as riding a white horse and leading the heavenly armies into the final battle of earth's history.

The rider was given a crown. The Greek word stephanos denotes the crown of victory and is regularly associated with Christ and His victorious people (see 2:10; 3:11). This rider appeared in John's vision as a conqueror. The concept of conquering in Revelation is associated with Christ's overcoming on Calvary. The scene of the first seal is symbolic. It describes the spreading of the gospel message, which started at Pentecost in A.D. 31. When Christ was exalted on the heavenly throne, He began the expansion of His kingdom. There were many territories to conquer and many people to win for the kingdom. In its initial stage, the proclamation of the gospel had a powerful start through the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:41, 47; 4:4). This expansion will continue throughout history until the ultimate conquest is achieved at the time of the end.

Christian Epochs: Seven Seals

Seal Opened	Seal Interpretation	Seal Period (Approximate)
1st	Pure message	ca. A.D. 31–100
2nd	Stained message	ca. A.D. 100–313
3rd	Corrupted message	ca. A.D. 313–538
4th	Restricted message	ca. A.D. 538–1517
5th	Reformation	ca. A.D. 1517–1755
6th	Awakening and judgment	ca. A.D. 1755–Second Coming
7th	Conflict ended

When applied historically, the first seal thus corresponds to the era of the church in Ephesus (2:1–7), referring to the apostolic period during which the gospel message spread rapidly throughout the world (Col. 1:23).

6:3–4
The Second Seal

Christ opening the second seal brought a fiery red horse onto the scene. Red is the color of blood and corresponds to the mission of this horse. The rider had a sword and was allowed to take peace from the earth, so that people would kill one another. The Greek word sphazō in Revelation is used to refer to the death of Christ (5:6) and His people because of their witness to the gospel (6:9; 18:24). The rider that John saw in vision did not do the killing himself, but he took peace from the earth, which resulted in the people slaying one another.

The second seal describes the consequences of the rejection of the gospel message in general terms. The first horseman represents Christ as He waged spiritual warfare through the preaching of the gospel. However, the forces of evil mounted strong resistance, resulting in the subsequent persecution (cf. Matt. 10:34). Thus, the second seal corresponds to the era of the church in Smyrna (2:8–11), which represents the period of persecution in the Roman Empire from the end of the first century to the beginning of the fourth century (ca. A.D. 313).

The Third Seal

When Christ the Lamb opened the third seal, a black horse appeared. John saw the rider holding a scale for weighing food in his hand and heard an announcement from one of the four living creatures regarding the prices of wheat and barley. In ancient Israel, grain, oil, and wine were the basic necessities of life (Deut. 11:14; Joel 2:19), and to make and eat bread by carefully weighing the grain indicated great scarcity or famine (Lev. 26:26; Ezek. 4:16). In John's day, a denarius was a daily wage (Matt. 20:2). In normal circumstances, a daily wage would have bought all of the necessities for an entire family. However, a famine would have enormously inflated the market price. In the scene of the third seal, it would have taken a whole day's work to buy just enough food for only one person, since a quart (1 L) of wheat was the daily ration for one person. In order to feed a small family in this setting, a day's wage would have been used to buy three quarts (2.84 L) of barley, which was a cheaper, coarser food for the poor.

The scene of the third seal points to what is to befall those who reject the gospel message. The black color corresponds to the mission of the horseman. Black is the opposite of white, so if the white horse represents the purity of the gospel being preached, the black horse denotes the absence or further corruption of the gospel. Grain in the Bible symbolizes the word of God (Luke 8:11). The rejection of the gospel usually results in a famine of the word of God similar to the one prophesied by Amos among the Israelites (Amos 8:11–13). Applying it historically, the third seal aptly corresponds to the era of the church in Pergamum (Rev. 2:12–17), which represents the fourth to sixth centuries of Christian history, a span of time that was characterized by a spiritual famine of the word of God. The famine of the third seal was not to be fatal, however. The same voice that commissioned the horseman announced that the oil and wine would not be affected and would continue to be available (6:6). Spiritually, oil symbolizes the Holy Spirit (1 Sam. 16:12–13; Luke 4:18; Acts 10:38) and wine symbolizes salvation in Jesus Christ (Matt. 26:27–29; 1 Cor. 11:25). Even when the word of God is scarce, the Holy Spirit is still at work and salvation is still available to all who desire it.

The Fourth Seal

With the opening of the fourth seal, a pale horse appeared. The Greek word chlōros denotes the ashen gray color of a decomposing corpse. John saw the rider, Death, accompanied by Hades, the abode of the dead. These two were allowed to destroy people over one-fourth of the earth by sword, famine, death or plague, and wild beasts. Noticeably, the single action of the fourth horseman comprised the actions of the previous three horsemen. The fourth seal called forth pestilence and death. The graphic portrayal of the scene conveys the perennial truth that spiritual famine of the word of God typically results in spiritual death. The good news, however, is that the power of Death and Hades is very limited; they were given authority over only a part, one-fourth, of the earth. Jesus assures us that He has the keys of Death and Hades (see 1:18). Death does not have power or authority over those who accept the gospel.

Applying it historically, the fourth seal corresponds to the church in Thyatira (2:18–29), which represents the spiritual death that characterized Christianity during the dark Middle Ages when the Bible was unavailable to people and tradition overruled its teachings.

The remaining three seals are very different from the first four. There are no horses with riders in action, and while the first four seals exclusively concern God's people, the remaining three refer to judgments that were to fall on those who would oppress God's people.

The Fifth Seal

The scene of the fifth seal portrays the souls of those who had been slain for the sake of the gospel. In the Bible, the Hebrew term nepesh (e.g., Gen. 2:7) and the Greek term psychē (e.g., Acts 2:41), both of which mean "soul," "life," or "living being," usually denote the whole person and are never used to signify an eternally conscious, incorporeal entity that survives death. The martyrs are pictured here as being under the altar, alluding to the sacrificial blood or life poured out at the base of the bronze altar of sacrifice in the courtyard before the tabernacle of the earthly sanctuary (Ex. 29:12; Lev. 4:7). The deaths of the martyrs are described as a pouring out of their lives as sacrificial blood before God (2 Tim. 4:6). Since believers "sleep" in death until the return of Christ (cf. 1 Thess. 4:13–18), this is a symbolic portrayal along the lines of the "crying out" of the blood of Abel as a witness to his unjust death (Gen. 4:10).

John heard the martyrs crying out to God for vindication against those who persecuted them. The expression "those who dwell on the earth" or "the inhabitants of the earth" in Revelation refers to those who oppose the gospel and are against God's people (8:13; 11:10; 13:8; 17:2). The cry of the martyrs was for vindication concerning the injustice of their deaths. They placed their trust in God. Here, through their unjustly spilled blood, they were asking God to bring justice and vindicate them. God responded to the plea: First, He gave them each a white robe, which in Revelation signifies Christ's righteousness by which God covers those accepted by Christ (3:4, 18). It also represents the future reward to overcomers in the church of Sardis (3:5). Believers receive assurance of salvation and eternal life through the scene.

Second, God told the martyrs that they were to rest and wait a little while longer until their brothers and sisters, who would go through a similar ordeal, would be made complete (v. 11). In the Bible, God promised that He will avenge the blood of His servants (Deut. 32:43; Ps. 79:10). Revelation 8–9 speaks of God's judgments being poured out on the inhabitants of the earth (8:13) throughout Christian history. The day is approaching when Christ will come in judgment to those who have not obeyed His gospel. They will be punished with "everlasting destruction," barred from the presence of the Lord and His glorious power forever (2 Thess. 1:8–10).

Most Bible translations insert the word "number" (Rev. 6:11), postulating that the martyrs had to wait for the completion of the number of martyrs. However, the word "number" does not appear in the Greek text. Revelation does not refer to a specific number of martyred saints that had to be reached but to the completeness of their characters. Those who have yet to go through martyrdom are to be made complete, just as the slain martyrs under the altar were. The text indicates clearly that those martyrs were perfected through receiving the robe of Christ's righteousness rather than through their own merits.

"How long . . . ?" has been the cry of God's oppressed people throughout history (Ps. 79:5; Dan. 12:6–7; Hab. 1:2). The fifth seal thus describes the experience of God's suffering people from the time of Abel until the time God finally judges and avenges the blood of His servants (Rev. 19:2). The scene is intended to assure God's suffering people that He hears their prayers.

The scene of the fifth seal may apply historically to the postmedieval period through the Protestant Reformation. God brought comfort to His persecuted people. Although millions of Christians were martyred because of their faithfulness to Christ during the medieval period and many more still will fall throughout history until the coming of Christ, justice will ultimately be dispensed (6:15–17).

6:12–17

The Sixth Seal

Knowledge of the fifth seal is essential for the interpretation of the sixth seal. The time had come for God to intervene in answer to the prayers of His people, who suffer injustice in a hostile world. The sixth seal portrays the signs that lead to the Second Coming, which include judgment against those who have harmed God's people. Its opening triggered cataclysmic events: a disastrous earthquake, the sun being blacked out, the moon appearing blood red, the stars falling, and the sky receding like a scroll (6:12–14). These cosmic signs are the same events Jesus foretold in Matthew 24:29–30, which were to occur at the conclusion of the tribulation of the Middle Ages. The sun, moon, stars, and sky are literal here; the use of the word "as" or "like" points to a symbolic analogy of an actual event. Christians in the Western world have recognized the fulfillment of this prophecy in the events of the Lisbon earthquake of 1755; the dark day and blood red moon of May 19, 1780, that was experienced in eastern New York and southern New England; and the spectacular meteor shower over the Atlantic Ocean on November 13, 1833, which in turn led to a series of revivals in North America known as the Second Great Awakening.

However, these supernatural events will be witnessed again at the return of Christ. John observed people of all walks of life panicking, trying to hide from the terror of the upheaval of the coming of Christ. He saw them begging the rocks and mountains to cover them in order to protect them from the One sitting on the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb (6:16; cf. Is. 2:19). This scene echoes the warning of Jesus, who, quoting Hosea 10:8, pointed to the time when His persecutors would "say to the mountains, 'Fall on us!' and to the hills, 'Cover us!'" (Luke 23:30). The vision records the arrival of the time for justice to be dispensed, when Christ's coming is imminent. At that time, He will be glorified in His people and wondered at by all who believe (2 Thess. 1:10).

The scene concludes with a rhetorical question from the terror-stricken wicked: Who can stand in the great day of the wrath of God (6:17; cf. Nah. 1:6; Mal. 3:2)? Revelation 7 answers that question.

7:1–17

The Sealed Saints

Chapter 7 provides the answer to the question raised in the conclusion of the scene of the sixth seal (6:17). As a prophetic parenthesis, it presents those able to stand on the great day of God's wrath as being the sealed people of God.

7:1–3. The Four Angels and the Winds. The scene begins with four angels at the four corners of the earth, which is an ancient way of referring to the four points of a compass. This description denotes the global significance of the scene. John saw the angels restraining the four winds from destroying the earth, the sea, and the trees. In the OT, winds are a symbol of destructive forces by which God executes judgments on the wicked (Is. 66:15–16; Jer. 23:19–20; Hos. 13:15), and the concept of the four winds is well attested (Jer. 49:36; Dan. 7:2). The blowing of the winds correlates with God's wrath in Revelation 6:17 and is another way of describing the seven last plagues that are to be poured on the wicked just before the Second Coming (Rev. 15–16) during the time of "the great tribulation" (7:14). However, these destructive forces are restrained by divine intervention until God's people have been sealed.

Next, John saw another angel coming up from the east, having the seal of the living God. In the Bible, the east is regularly associated with the direction from which God comes (e.g., Ezek. 43:2). For example, Jesus prophesied that the Son of Man would come from the east (Matt. 24:27–30). Therefore, the angel whom John saw was coming from God Himself. The angel instructed the four angels not to unleash the winds until God had placed His seal on the foreheads of His servants. In ancient times, the fundamental meaning of sealing was ownership; a seal impression on an object pointed to the owner. This is the meaning of the symbolic sealing in the NT as well. According to Paul, the meaning of the seal is that the Lord knows those who are His (2 Tim. 2:19). God recognizes those who belong to Him and seals them with the Holy Spirit (Eph. 1:13–14). To grieve the Holy Spirit means to lose one's sealing (Eph. 4:30). From John's prophetic standpoint, at the time of the end, a seal on the forehead was used to distinguish those who were on God's side from those who were not. Those siding with the beast were to receive the mark of the beast on their foreheads or their right hands (Rev. 13:16–17). However, those worshiping God were to be sealed only on their foreheads (14:1).

The faithfulness of the sealed has been tested in every generation of Christians. Revelation presents the test in the final crisis as being the keeping of God's commandments (see Rev. 12:17; 14:12), with the fourth commandment being the test of obedience to God (14:7). As the Sabbath was the sign of God's people in biblical times (Ex. 31:12–17; Ezek. 20:12, 20), so John presented it as the sign of loyalty to God in the final crisis.

At the time of the end, the seal was to have additional significance, functioning as a sign of protection as well. Revelation presents those with the seal of God on their foreheads as the ones who are protected from the destructive forces of the seven last plagues. This entire scene echoes the vision of Ezekiel 9, which concerned the destruction of Jerusalem before the Exile. In this OT vision, the mark on the forehead distinguished those who were on God's side from others who were unfaithful and idolatrous and provided the faithful with protection from the impending judgment (Ezek. 9:1–11). As in Ezekiel's vision, the seal in Revelation 7 identifies God's people and protects them from the symbolic blowing of the eschatological winds. The question raised in Revelation 6:17 is finally answered as the vision identifies those who are able to stand on the day of divine wrath: the sealed people of God.

7:4–8. The Sealed 144,000. As the sealing was taking place, John heard the number of those who had been sealed: 144,000 from the tribes of Israel. Both the number 144,000 and the tribes are symbolic due to the fact that Revelation is a symbolic book (cf. 1:1). It stands for the totality of God's end-time people (see "The 144,000 and the Twelve Tribes," p. 1959).

The announcement of the number of the sealed marks the completion of the sealing. The destructive forces of the seven last plagues were then to be unleashed and the sealed 144,000 were then about to enter the great tribulation. However, the great tribulation is portrayed not in Revelation 7 but in Revelation 16.

7:9–14. The Great Multitude. At this point, John saw an innumerable multitude from every nation, tribe, people, and language "standing before the throne and before the Lamb" (v. 9). Many interpreters have asserted that the 144,000 are the end-time generation of the faithful who will go through the great tribulation of the last days and the great multitude refers to God's people of all ages. However, the evidence does not seem to support such an assertion. The passage indicates that the great multitude was to go through the great tribulation (see 7:14–15).

The key to an understanding of the relationship between the two groups is found in the literary feature "I heard" versus "I saw" that occurs in the book. Many times, John heard one thing in vision but saw an entirely different symbol when he turned to look (see 5:5–6; 17:1–3). This is the situation in Revelation 7. We must keep in mind that John had previously only heard that the number of the sealed people of God was 144,000. They were on earth, pictured as the militant church, organized and ready to enter the great tribulation. But John had not yet seen them; when he did, they were a great, incalculable crowd coming out of the great tribulation (7:13–14). They were the church triumphant, no longer on earth but in heaven before the throne of God. The war was over and they were no longer organized into military divisions. They were celebrating their great victory and were about to receive their

The 144,000 and the Twelve Tribes

The number 144,000 is arrived at by multiplying twelve by twelve, which totals 144, and then multiplying it by one thousand. In the OT, twelve is the number of the tribes of Israel, who were the people of God, and in the NT, it is also the number of the church, built on the foundation of the twelve apostles (Eph. 2:20). In this way, the number twelve functions as a symbol of the church. In the vision of the new Jerusalem, the names of the twelve tribes of Israel are inscribed on the twelve gates of the city and the names of the twelve apostles on its twelve foundation stones. Thus, 144,000 represents the fullness of the people of God at the close of the cosmic conflict on earth.

Furthermore, the list of the twelve tribes of Israel (vv. 5–8) is also symbolic for at least two reasons: First, the twelve tribes of Israel are not in existence today. During the Assyrian conquest of the northern kingdom of Israel, the ten tribes were taken into captivity (2 Kin. 17:6–23), where they soon became amalgamated with other nations and largely disappeared. With the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the two remaining tribes, Judah and Benjamin, were scattered throughout the Roman Empire. As a result, the Judaism of today is not comprised of the original twelve tribes. Second, the list of the twelve tribes in Revelation 7 is not a regular list of the tribes of Israel. Judah is listed as the first tribe instead of Reuben, and the tribes of Dan and Ephraim are missing while Joseph and Levi are included instead. The obvious reason for their exclusion is that in the OT, the two tribes of Dan and Ephraim were associated with idolatry. Dan was the first of the tribes to turn to idolatry (Judg. 18:27–32) and, later in Israel's history, it became such an influential center of idolatrous worship that it competed with the temple worship in Jerusalem (1 Kin. 12:28–31). Ephraim refused King Hezekiah's invitation to the Passover, and this tribe's name became associated with idolatry throughout the entire northern kingdom of Israel (2 Chr. 30:1–10; Hos. 4:17). The Jews of John's day believed that the antichrist would come out of the tribe of Dan, which shows that the list of tribes in Revelation 7 represents a theological reality: God's purified church. The unfaithfulness that characterized the tribes of Dan and Ephraim explains why they are not mentioned among the sealed people of God.

The twelve tribes in Revelation 7 stand for the whole people of God in the last days. The church in the NT is referred to in terms of the twelve tribes of Israel (James 1:1) and "the Israel of God" (Gal. 6:16; cf. Rom. 11:26). The symbolic number 144,000 describes the militant church as being comprised of 144 military units of one thousand each, or in other words, as an army ready to battle Satan and his army of two hundred million (Rev. 9:16). Revelation 19:18 shows that Satan's army is symbolically organized into military units of one thousand each, since the word chiliarchos ("captain," "general") denotes a commander of one thousand soldiers (cf. 6:15). Such language is used to emphasize the reality of the final conflict.

reward. The 144,000 and the great multitude seem to be the same group of God's end-time people pictured at two different points in the great conflict between good and evil. The calculable symbolic number—144,000—stands in contrast to the incalculable and literal great multitude. This does not mean that the great multitude could not be counted, just that 144,000 is the symbolic number of the great multitude whose number is not given but is much greater than 144,000.

John saw that the great multitude were clothed in white robes, had palm branches (signs of triumph and victory) in their hands, and were praising God and the Lamb for their salvation (v. 9). In ancient times, Roman generals and soldiers were clothed in white robes and palm branches were used to celebrate a successful military victory. Here we see the fulfillment of the promise to the overcomers in Sardis that they would walk before Christ clothed in white garments (3:4–5). Revelation 7:14 shows that the robes of the multitude were made white by the blood of the Lamb.

The redeemed saints expressed their rejoicing before the throne by giving gratitude to God and the Lamb for their salvation (v. 10), which resulted from Christ's great victory on the cross, not from their own holiness and works. Their praise echoes the praise of the twenty-four elders in 5:8–10; it was on the cross that Christ purchased people from every language and nation for God, paying with His blood. The redeemed in Revelation 7 recognized that their salvation was a result of what Christ had done for them (v. 10). The white robes that were washed in the blood of the Lamb made all the redeemed equal before God (7:14).

7:15–17. The Reward of the Redeemed. At the conclusion of the vision, John was given a glimpse of the future glorious reward of the redeemed, which he describes more extensively in chapters 21–22. "They are before the throne of God," where they serve both day and night in His temple (7:15). God promised that He will "dwell with them" (see 21:3). By using language that describes ancient Israel, God was declaring that their wilderness experience had concluded. Their hunger, thirst, and suffering from heat will be relieved (7:16). The Lamb will shepherd them and lead them to living water springs (7:17), where they will finally find their homeland (see 22:1). God further promised that He will wipe all tears from their eyes (see 21:4). Here is the fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy about the rest and security of God's people (Is. 32:18).

The Seventh Seal

Having described those who will be able to stand firm at the upheaval of Christ's coming, John concluded the scene of the seven seals. When Christ the Lamb opened the seventh seal, "there was silence in heaven for about half an hour." In the Bible, silence is regularly associated with the coming of God in judgment (e.g., Zeph. 1:7; Zech. 2:13). The Jews of John's day believed that silence occurred in heaven so that the prayers of the saints could be heard and answered in judgment against the wicked. Since the seventh seal is to be opened after the Second Coming, as indicated by the fact that 6:12–17 is a description of that event, we suggest that the silence in heaven will occur in the context of the final judgment and the conclusion of the Great Controversy. "Half an hour" refers here to a relatively short time.

8:2—11:19
THE SEVEN TRUMPETS

Revelation 8:2 begins a new vision that describes the seven angels blowing trumpets. After the sixth trumpet (8:2—9:21), there is an aside that deals with the vision of a mighty angel and the two witnesses (10:1—11:14). Then John introduces the seventh trumpet (11:15–18). The sounding of the trumpets was to trigger a chain of events on the earth. As in other visions of Revelation, the symbolism of the trumpets is rooted in the OT. Numbers 10:8–10 describes trumpets as sacred instruments that were blown by priests in different contexts: worship, battles, harvesttime, or festivals. They were used for the purpose of calling on God to "remember" His covenant with His people. The blowing of the trumpets went hand in hand with prayer. During a battle, the trumpet sound would "remind" God to intervene on behalf of His people and to deliver them from their enemies (see 2 Chr. 13:14). This concept is the backdrop for the trumpet series of Revelation 8–11. Each trumpet affects a third of the earth. In the OT, judgments against apostate Israel are described as affecting one third of the nation (Ezek. 5:12–13; Zech. 13:8–9). In Revelation, the expression "a third" refers to a part of Satan's kingdom being affected by divine judgments (12:4; cf. 16:19).

Introduction to the Trumpets: The Prayers of the Saints

The vision opens with a scene of the seven angels, all of whom were given trumpets to blow, standing before God. However, it is not until v. 6 that the angels are seen blowing their trumpets. In between, vv. 3–5 function as an introduction to the trumpets. The sanctuary setting provides the theological context for the seven trumpets, and the introduction replicates the daily services of the earthly temple. After the sacrificial lamb had been placed on the bronze altar of sacrifice, the blood was poured out at the base of that altar (Lev. 4:27–30). The appointed priest would take a golden censer, fill it with coals, and offer incense on the golden altar in the Holy Place (Ex. 30:1–8). Afterward, according to later Jewish Mishnah tradition, the priest would come out of the temple and throw the firepan on the pavement between the entrance to the temple and the altar of sacrifice, producing a very loud noise. At that point, seven priests blew trumpets, marking the end of the daily services. It is possible that the casting down of the firepan and the blowing of seven trumpets in Revelation parallels this practice.

John saw another angel holding a golden censer and standing at the altar, which was probably the altar of sacrifices in the courtyard of the earthly sanctuary. In biblical typology, the court of the tabernacle stood for the earth (cf. Rev. 11:2). This shows that the activity of the angel whom John saw (8:3–5) began on earth but would move to the heavenly temple. The angel is portrayed as standing at the same altar underneath which, according to the fifth seal, the blood of the martyred saints cried out to God for vindication and justice (6:10). At this altar, the angel was given a large amount of incense to offer, representing the prayers of God's "people" or "saints" (Rev. 5:8; cf. Ps. 141:2) on the golden altar in the heavenly temple before the throne. The smoke of the incense, with the prayers of the saints, ascended before God. In such a way, the prayers of God's suffering people are heard by God.

The angel then filled the censer with fire from the altar and hurled it down to the earth. The thunderclaps, rumbling voices, lightning flashes, and earthquake represented the presence of God and signaled the seven angels to blow their trumpets. This hurling of fire mirrors the scene in Ezekiel's vision in which the man clothed in linen took coals of fire from between the cherubim and hurled them on rebellious Jerusalem (Ezek. 10:2). Ezekiel's vision shows that the hurling of fire on the earth in Revelation 8:5 denotes judgment on rebellious humanity. This whole scene defines the seven trumpets as God's judgments on rebellious humanity in response to the prayers of His oppressed and persecuted people.

The seven-trumpet series, like the seven seals, covers the course of history from the cross until the conclusion of this earth's history. The trumpets are blown while intercession goes on in heaven (8:3–6) and the gospel is preached on earth (10:8—11:14). There is some diversity of interpretation of the trumpets among Adventist historicists. We offer here what we think is a biblical and viable interpretation that simultaneously acknowledges that others may choose a different reading.

The First Trumpet

When the first angel blew the trumpet, hail and fire mixed with blood were hurled on the earth, and a third of the trees and all green grass were burned up. This scene recalls the seventh plague to fall on Egypt (Ex. 9:23–25). In the OT, hail mixed with fire that causes bloodshed is the means of judgment against the enemies of Israel (Is. 30:30; Ezek. 38:22–23). On the other hand, trees and grass are frequent symbols of God's people (Is. 44:2–4; Jer. 17:7–8). This leads to the conclusion that hail and fire mixed with blood destroying trees and green grass in the first trumpet's scene symbolize God's judgments against apostate believers who have joined the ranks of the opponents of God (Jer. 11:16; Ezek. 20:47). The scene of the first trumpet clearly echoes the words of Jesus in Luke 23:31. In addressing the inhabitants of Jerusalem, Jesus compared Himself to a green tree and those who rejected Him to dry trees. Jesus was symbolically referring to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, which took place several decades later (Luke 21:20).

This suggests that the first trumpet heralds judgment on those of God's people who were involved in persecuting Christ and the early church. While many Jews and Jewish leaders accepted Christ, many of them rejected Him and became opponents of the gospel. Consequently, they placed themselves outside the protection of the covenant. Just as how in the OT hail and fire were used to signify God's judgments against the enemies of Israel, so in John's prophecy the first trumpet brought judgments against God's own people who had turned into persecutors of the followers of Christ. The first trumpet appears to be portraying the events of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70, one of the bitterest chapters in Jewish history.

The Second Trumpet

At the sound of the second trumpet, something resembling a great mountain burning with fire was thrown into the sea. Mountains in the OT are sometimes equated with kingdoms (e.g., Ps. 48:1–3; Jer. 51:25; Ezek. 35:2–4), and the fact that the mountain in the second trumpet is described as large or great (Gr. mega) shows that a great empire is in view. The sea in the Bible frequently symbolizes large populations of people who often are violently opposed to God (Rev. 17:15; e.g., Is. 17:12–13; 57:20; Jer. 51:42). The plague of the second trumpet turned a third of the sea into blood, causing the death of a third of the living creatures and wrecking a third of the ships. This scene of water turning to blood echoes the first plague against Egypt (Ex. 7:19–21). Furthermore, the destruction of ships as the conveyers of wealth refers to the subjugation of human pride (Ezek. 27:29–32; Rev. 18:17–21). Here again, the phrase "a third" shows that a part of Satan's kingdom is affected by the judgments of God.

The second trumpet particularly echoes Jeremiah's prophecy concerning the fall of Babylon. Because of the atrocities done to Judah, Babylon would, like the burning mountain (Jer. 51:25), be cast into the Euphrates River to sink and rise no more (Jer. 51:63–64). The same language is used in Revelation 18:21 to describe the demise of end-time Babylon. In John's day, the name Babylon was used for the great Roman Empire (e.g., 1 Pet. 5:13). Because Rome, like Babylon, destroyed Jerusalem and the temple, it was to suffer a similar fate. At the time of John, Christians, who viewed Rome as the new Babylon, could easily identify the symbolic burning mountain of the second trumpet as a prophecy of the downfall of the Roman Empire—the empire involved in putting Jesus to death and persecuting the early church in an effort to prevent the spreading of the gospel to the world.

8:10–11

The Third Trumpet

When the third trumpet sounded, a great star burning like a torch fell from heaven. Stars in the Bible often represent angels (Job 38:7), and the fact that this star is characterized as great shows that this particular angel is of an exalted rank. Satan is a likely candidate, since Isaiah 14:12–15 refers to him as "fallen from heaven" and he is portrayed elsewhere in Revelation as having been cast from heaven to the earth (Rev. 12:9).

The star of the third trumpet is named Wormwood, after an herb notorious for its bitterness and poisonous qualities (Deut. 29:18). The Wormwood star turned the waters bitter, causing many to die. In Jeremiah, when the people of Israel spurned the covenant with God, they were given wormwood to eat and poisoned water to drink (Jer. 9:13–15; 23:15).

The Wormwood star fell "on a third of the rivers and on the springs of water" (v. 10). A third of the waters turned bitter and caused many people to die. The waters spoken of here symbolize spiritual nourishment for spiritually thirsty people (John 7:37). The scene of the third trumpet describes Satan polluting the springs and streams of truth and salvation with human teaching, which had a poisonous and deadly effect. Paul predicted a great apostasy that would invade the church (e.g., 2 Thess. 2:1–12). However, this apostasy would not come until the removal of the restrainer. It is possible that Paul had the Roman Empire in mind, which God used to restrain the revelation of "the man of sin" or "man of lawlessness" for some time (see commentary on 2 Thess. 2:3–4 and 2:5–7). Following the interpretation that sees in the second trumpet the collapse of the Roman Empire, which plunged the world into the darkness of the Middle Ages, mainstream Christianity departed from the purity of the gospel and replaced it with tradition and scholastic teachings. The gospel truth was corrupted into a system of dogmas with devastating effects. Thus, the third trumpet describes the consequences of the medieval apostasy in terms of the spiritual death of those who drank from its polluted water.

The Fourth Trumpet

The plague, after the fourth trumpet sounded, struck a third of the sun, a third of the moon, and a third of the stars, causing darkness on a third of the earth. This scene evokes the ninth plague that brought darkness across the land of Egypt (Ex. 10:21–23). In the OT, the darkening of celestial bodies announces the coming of God's judgment (Is. 13:9–11; Joel 3:15). Darkness is also a symbol of judgment for apostasy (Mic. 3:6). Since light in the NT stands for the gospel message (John 8:12; Col. 1:13), darkness denotes the absence of the gospel. When people reject the gospel for darkness, they bring God's judgment on themselves (John 3:19).

The fourth trumpet may describe the condition of the world in the post–Middle Ages period. The Reformation of the sixteenth century restored the Bible as the rule of faith and teaching. However, the vibrant generation of Reformers was succeeded by lifeless Protestant scholasticism characterized by theological polemics and controversies. Such a situation had a ruinous effect on Christianity. The intellectual revolution in Europe during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries led to the rise of rationalism, skepticism, humanism, and liberalism, which ultimately gave birth to secularism. Despite its positive impact on science, politics, religious liberty, arts, and education, with its materialistic orientation and denial of supernaturalism, secularism gradually eroded Christian faith and robbed millions of the hope of salvation. The fourth trumpet scene thus describes the dreadful consequences of the darkening of the spiritual source of the true light under the prevailing influence of secularism.

At this point, John heard a voice of one flying through the air announcing a triple "woe," warning the inhabitants of the earth of more severe punishments to come (8:13). While some manuscripts read "angel," the earliest known manuscripts have "eagle" or "vulture" here. In the Bible, the eagle or vulture is a symbol of impending judgments (Deut. 28:49; Hos. 8:1). This brings to mind the words of Jesus that eagles (or vultures) will gather (Matt. 24:28). The worst is yet to come on the inhabitants of the earth.

9:1–11

The Fifth Trumpet

The description of the plagues heralded by the fifth and sixth angels is more detailed and frightening. There is a divergence of opinions concerning the interpretation of the details of these two trumpets. The view expressed here follows a reexamination of the interpretation of these two trumpets that is based on a careful evaluation of the language used in the prophecy and its symbolic meaning in the Scriptures. The interpretation that follows is not intended to be dogmatic; it is offered to stimulate further investigation.

9:1–6. The Demonic Locusts. At the sound of the fifth trumpet, John saw a star that had fallen to the earth (v. 1). This is the same star spoken of in the third trumpet that poisoned the streams and springs of water (8:10–11) and is thus a reference to Satan himself, the ruler of the power of the air (Eph. 2:2) who had fallen from heaven (Rev. 12:9; Is. 14:12; Luke 10:18). Later in the text, he is identified as the angel of the abyss or bottomless pit and the leader of the demonic army (9:11). The star was given the key to the bottomless pit (abyssos), which has been the abode of Satan and the fallen angels since their expulsion from heaven (Luke 8:31). They are temporarily confined there with limited freedom of movement until they receive their punishment (2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6). In the fifth trumpet, however, the vision presents the restraint as having been removed, giving the demonic forces more freedom to do their harmful work.

As John watched, the star opened the bottomless pit, releasing a dense cloud of locusts that resembled the smoke of a large furnace (v. 2). In the OT, locusts are a symbol of overwhelming judgment (Ex. 10:14–15; Jer. 51:14; Joel 2:4–10). The power of these locusts is compared to the power of scorpions (also in 9:5). Jesus used scorpions as a metaphor for demons (Luke 10:17–20). By using the symbol of a scorpion-like locust, John describes the supernatural demonic forces that will operate deceptively and overwhelmingly in the world as we near the end of time. This gigantic cloud created thick darkness in the sky, which echoes the locust plague on Egypt (Ex. 10:13–15) and the prophecy of Joel in which the locust plague caused the darkening of the sun, the moon, and the stars (Joel 2:2, 10). Darkness is the opposite of light. Since the light stands for the gospel, the darkness symbolizes the absence of the gospel (see commentary on Rev. 8:12–13). The demonic locusts in the prophecy of the fifth trumpet seem to have obliterated the light of the gospel. What followed was spiritual torment and mental anguish that had devastating effects.

The demonic locusts were commanded not to harm the grass, plants, and trees (v. 4), all of which symbolize God's people (see Rev. 8:7). They could harm only those who did not have the seal of God on their foreheads. The vision thus presents God's people as protected from the locusts' harmful activities by the seal of God (see Rev. 7:4). Furthermore, these demonic locusts were not permitted to kill people, but only to torment them for five months. There is disagreement among historicist interpreters concerning the specific years covered by this prophetic period. The only mention of a five-month period in the OT is in connection with the Flood, during which Noah and his family were under divine protection from the floodwaters (Gen. 7:24; 8:3). In a way similar to how the floodwaters overwhelmed the wicked while the righteous were preserved, the torment of the demonic locusts was both spiritual and mental, driving the wicked into suicidal anguish (v. 6) while those who were sealed and therefore under God's protection were spared.

9:7–11. The Description of the Locusts. In seeking to describe the demonic locusts, John uses eight figurative analogies: they appeared like horses prepared for battle, they wore something like golden crowns, they had humanlike faces and hair like women, their teeth were like those of lions, they had iron-like breastplates, the sound of their wings was like that of battle chariots, and they had scorpion-like tails (vv. 7–10). This symbolic description of the demonic locusts echoes the description of locusts in Joel 2:2–11.

As in Joel's prophecy, the locusts resemble an army. However, they were not a real army, for their activity was not military but spiritual. Their weapons were tails with stingers like scorpions, which they used to afflict people. In the Bible, the tail is a symbol of deception. Isaiah refers to the false prophet who deceives as "the tail" (9:14–15). The tail of the dragon caused one third of the heavenly beings to rebel against God (12:4, 9). In contrast to regular locusts that have no leader (Prov. 30:27), this locust-like demonic army in Revelation had a leader who is identified as the angel of the bottomless pit. His name in Hebrew is Abaddon ("destruction"), and in Greek Apollyon ("destroyer"). No doubt this demonic leader is Satan himself, the ruler or prince of demons (Matt. 12:24) and of the kingdoms or powers of the air (Eph. 2:2). He is the fallen star from heaven to whom authority was given over the abyss in the prophecy (Rev. 9:1). His followers are referred to as the destroyers of the earth (11:18).

The fifth trumpet describes the spiritual condition of the world in the aftermath of the Age of Enlightenment, which was characterized by the rise of rationalism, skepticism, humanism, relativism, and liberalism. Ultimately, it gave rise to secularism and its negative effects on Christianity. God-centered theology was replaced by atheistic, human-centered philosophy, which has little or no room for God. Rationalism and human philosophies, which have become the ultimate standard of truth, alienated people from God and from each other, thus creating in them the agony of emptiness and meaninglessness. Resistance to the transforming power of the gospel provides an opportunity for Satan and his demonic forces to fill this emptiness. The situation is similar to that of the time of Amos, when Israel turned justice and righteousness into bitter poison (Amos 6:12) and swarms of locusts came on their land (Amos 7:1–2). By rejecting the gospel, the people of the world are left defenseless against demonic activities (Amos 8:10–11).

9:12–21

The Sixth Trumpet

Unfortunately, the worst was yet to come with the sixth and seventh trumpets that followed the frightening woe of the fifth trumpet (i.e., the self-sufficiency of modern secularism).

9:13–15. Release of the Demonic Army. At the sound of the sixth trumpet, John heard a voice from the four horns of the golden altar of incense in the heavenly temple ordering the angel with the sixth trumpet to release the four angels who were bound at the great river Euphrates (see Rev. 16:12). The fact that the scene of the sixth trumpet is initiated from the altar of incense shows that the prayers of God's people were still remembered (8:3–4) and the door of salvation was still open. The four angels that were to be released correspond to the four angels that were restraining the destroying winds in 7:1–3. The Euphrates River in the OT was the boundary that separated God's people from their enemies (Is. 7:20; Jer. 46:10), who came from this great river. Their attack was often described in terms of the overflowing waters of the Euphrates sweeping over the land of Judah (e.g., Is. 8:7–8). The four angels had been prepared for the "hour and day and month and year" (Rev. 9:15), an expression that does not seem to be a prophetic period but refers to a specific point in time appointed by God for the release of the angels to kill a third of humankind, all a part of Satan's kingdom. In the prophecy, this divinely appointed time had come.

9:16–19. The Description of the Demonic Army. At this point, a huge army of "twice ten thousand times ten thousand" or "two hundred million" cavalry troops appeared. The reference to having "heard" the number (see Rev. 7:4) shows that the number two hundred million stands in contrast to the 144,000 of God's end-time people. The demonic forces that were shown afflicting humans in the fifth trumpet had grown into a huge army that was spiritually killing humanity. In the fifth trumpet, they were not allowed to kill, only to afflict (9:4–6). However, here they both afflicted and killed.

John had trouble describing this demonic cavalry. The riders on the horses had breastplates of fiery red, dark blue, and sulfurous yellow, a reflection of fire, smoke, and sulfur emanating from the horses' mouths (vv. 17–18). The heads of the horses were like the heads of lions, and out of their mouths emanated fire, smoke, and sulfur or brimstone with which they killed human beings. In the OT, fire, smoke, and brimstone or sulfur are a means of executing divine judgment (Gen. 19:24; Ps. 11:6; Ezek. 38:22). These will also be used for the destruction of the wicked at the final judgment (Rev. 14:10–11; 20:10; 21:8).

The power of the horses is said to be in their mouths and their tails, the latter of which correspond to the tails of the demonic forces of the fifth trumpet (see 9:10). This identifies the activities of the demonic forces in the sixth trumpet to be a continuation of the fifth trumpet. As previously noted (see commentary on Rev. 9:7–11), in the Bible, the tail is a symbol of deception by which Satan turns people away from God to himself. Isaiah refers to the false prophet who deceives as "the tail" (Is. 9:14–15). The mouth is a symbol of spiritual weaponry in the end-time battle between Christ and Satan (cf. Rev. 16:13–14; 19:15, 21). This shows the nature of this final crisis as not physical or military but spiritual: a battle for the minds and hearts of all people (2 Cor. 10:3–5). While in the prophecy of the fifth trumpet the tails of the demonic forces are scorpion-like and afflict people, in the prophecy of the sixth trumpet they are serpent-like and kill people. In Revelation, Satan is the ancient snake who deceives the whole world (12:9). The tails with the serpent heads, weaponry of the demonic forces, are symbols of Satan's deceptive activities by which he leads people astray from God.

9:20–21. No repentance. However, the rest of humanity—those not killed by the plagues—did not repent. They continued to worship demons and idols of gold, silver, brass, stone, and wood. This echoes Daniel 5, when the Babylonians kept worshiping their self-made gods prior to Babylon's fall (Dan. 5:23–24). Rebellious humanity, tormented by the demons, did not want to turn to God. They did not repent of their murders, sorcery, sexual immorality, or theft (v. 21). In the Bible, these vices are the fruits of worshiping idols (Rom. 1:18–32), and all are the characteristics of those who do not follow the Lamb (cf. Rev. 21:8; 22:15).

There are some strong parallels between the sixth trumpet and Revelation 7:1–4 and 16:12–16. Both the sixth trumpet and Revelation 7:1–4 mention four angels who restrained the plagues that were about to come on the inhabitants of the earth, both talk about binding and releasing the destructive forces, and both refer to John hearing a number (7:4; 9:16). Also, in both the sixth trumpet and Revelation 16:12–16, we find the river Euphrates, demonic activities, military language, and mouths used as weapons in the end-time conflict. These parallels suggest that the sixth trumpet brings us to the very time of the end. It seems to describe events leading up to the battle of Armageddon further described in Revelation 16:12–16. The scene of the sixth trumpet describes the great gathering of Satan's army for the end-time battle of Armageddon.

The fifth trumpet was a warning as the end approaches, reflecting the situation in this world that is characterized by an increase in demonic activity. While in the fifth trumpet the demonic forces were very active, their power was still limited and restrained by God (9:4–6). However, at the blast of the sixth trumpet, the evil forces are unleashed to do their harmful activities under the governance of Satan. The prophecy presents the people who lack the seal of God as being helpless against the demonic powers. It is during these intense demonic activities that God makes a special effort to reach human hearts through the proclamation of the everlasting gospel (14:6–13).

10:1–11

The Mighty Angel with the Scroll

At this point, the sequence of the seven trumpets is interrupted. Before the sounding of the seventh trumpet, there is a question to be answered regarding God's people during this time. Just as the interlude between the sixth and seventh seals identifies God's end-time people (Rev. 7), the interlude between the sixth and seventh trumpets describes their task and experience in the world during the time of the end.

10:1–2. The Angel with the Scroll. John saw another mighty angel descending from heaven. This angel was clothed with a cloud, pointing to a divine appearance (Rev. 1:7). There was a rainbow above his head as a sign of God's covenant (cf. Gen. 9:12–17) and his face shone like the sun as the face of Jesus did on the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17:2). Finally, his feet resembled pillars of fire, bringing to mind the pillar of fire that led the people of Israel during their wilderness journey (Ex. 13:21–22). Since the description of this angel resembles in some detail the description of Christ in Revelation 1:13–16, it is possible that this angel is Christ Himself.

The angel held a little scroll or book open in his hand. This scroll or book could be related to the scroll with seven seals in Revelation 5 in that it contains the description of the time of the end that is portrayed in Revelation 12–22. Christ had disclosed these things to God's people via the angel (1:1) to prepare them for the coming final crisis as He had prepared Daniel in the visions of Daniel 7–12. Thus, the little book is understood to be the book of Daniel, which had been sealed, but which the second half of Revelation expands on in more depth. The following verses contain allusions to the prophecies of Daniel (vv. 5–11; cf. Dan. 12:7–13).

The angel placed his right foot on the sea and his left foot on the land (v. 2), denoting the universal scope of the message to be proclaimed—a message of special significance for the entire earth. He was to make the proclamation with a loud voice that resembled a lion's roar. In the OT, God's voice is frequently likened to a lion's roar (Hos. 11:10; Amos 3:8). This identifies the angel's proclamation as coming from God and as particularly important for God's people.

10:3–4. The Seven Thunders. As the angel began to speak, John heard seven thunders. In the Bible, the voice of God is often equated with the sound of thunder (Job 37:5; John 12:28–30). In Psalm 29:3–9, the sevenfold voice of God is referred to as the sound of thunder. The seven thunders here stand for the fullness of God's message, seven being the number of fullness. John was about to write down what the thunders had said, but he was told to seal up what he had heard and not to record it. This is very unusual, because elsewhere in Revelation, John was instructed to write whatever was shown to him and not to seal up the messages of the book (1:19; 22:10).

God has revealed to us in the prophetic word all the things that are important for salvation. However, there are some things about the future that God has not revealed, such as when and how the final events will take place. Although John heard them, he was not allowed to write them down in the book. In the study of end-time prophecies, we must not engage in unfounded speculations about what God has not intended for us to know.

10:5–7. Time No Longer. The angel raised up his hand toward heaven and, with a solemn voice, swore by Him who lives forever and who created the heavens, the earth, and everything in them that there should be no more chronos. This word, variously translated "delay," "time," or "interval of time," denotes the duration of a period in contrast to kairos, which denotes a point in time, a fixed or definite period, or a season (although the two terms often overlap in meaning).

This scene alludes to Daniel 12:4–10. Daniel was ordered to seal up the words of his book until the time of the end. Afterward, there was a question regarding how long it would be before the persecution of the saints was over and the prophesied events would take place. In response, the heavenly messenger raised his hands toward heaven and swore an oath by the One who lives forever that the persecution of God's people would last for a time, times, and half a time (Dan. 12:7). After the completion of this prophetic period, the end would come.

Revelation 10 points to Daniel 12 in all ways with the exception of the phrase "there will no longer be time" (Rev. 10:6; author's translation), which replaces the reference to the time, times, and half a time in Daniel 12:7. "A time, times, and half a time" is a reference to the prophetic period of 1,260 years (A.D. 538–1798), during which God's people were persecuted by apostate Christianity. In Revelation 10:7, God's people are assured that there will no longer be an appointed prophetic period. The time prophesied by Daniel has expired, the prophecies of the book are now unsealed, and the history of this world is nearing its close. Commenting on Revelation 10:7, Ellen White states: "This time, which the angel declares with a solemn oath, is . . . prophetic time, which should precede the advent of our Lord. That is, the people will not have another message upon definite time. After this period of time, reaching from 1842 to 1844, there can be no definite tracing of the prophetic time. The longest reckoning reaches to the autumn of 1844" (SDABC 7:971).

Although the time of the end prophesied by Daniel is set in motion, the angel's warning to John tells us that the end is not yet here. At the sound of the seventh trumpet, the mystery of God will be completed, just as He announced to His servants the prophets. The mystery referred to by the angel encompasses the whole purpose of God in establishing His eternal kingdom. This mystery is symbolized by the sealed scroll of Revelation 5, which was hidden for ages (Rom. 16:25–26; Col. 1:26–27). While that mystery was resolved in the gospel (Eph. 1:9; 3:5–12), its consummation will take place at the Second Coming.

10:8–11. The Commissioning of John. John's experience eating the scroll echoes that of Ezekiel when he was called to prophetic ministry (Ezek. 2:8—3:11). Through these similar incidents, the Lord revealed to the two prophets the experience and mission of God's end-time remnant (see "Bittersweet Experience of God's End-Time People," p. 1968).

11:1–19

The Two Witnesses

In Revelation 10, John was told that before the coming of the end, there would be a final proclamation of the gospel throughout the world. What is that message?

11:1. The Measuring of the Temple. John received a measuring reed and was commanded to "measure" the temple of God, the altar, and the worshipers, a word that in the Bible means to "evaluate" or "judge" metaphorically (2 Cor. 10:12). In the OT, the Hebrew word madad is used to express God's act of judging the sins of His people (Is. 65:7), and in the NT, the Greek word metron is used to designate the final judgment (Matt. 7:2). This scene echoes Ezekiel's vision in which the prophet saw a divine person measuring the temple for the purpose of restoring it (Ezek. 40–43). In light of Ezekiel's vision, the measuring of the temple in Revelation is related to the restoration of the temple. The temple that John was to measure is the temple in heaven. In the OT, the temple, altar, and worshipers are only mentioned together in connection with the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:16–19, 30–31), which was the annual day of judgment when God ultimately dealt with the sins of His people. This concept is the backdrop of Revelation 11:1. It shows that the measuring here refers to the judgment, which is to take place prior to the Second Coming (14:7). It will concern God's people exclusively, who are the worshipers in the temple, and its purpose will be to determine who has been faithful to the Lord and who has not.

Revelation 11:1 shows that the message of Christ's work in the heavenly sanctuary lies at the heart of the final declaration of the gospel. Throughout the history of sin, Satan has constantly challenged God's character and governance. The heavenly sanctuary message concerns the vindication of God's character and the restoration of His rightful rule over the universe. As such, it unfolds new aspects of the meaning of the gospel message regarding the atoning work of Christ and His righteousness as the only means of salvation for humanity.

11:2. The Trampling of the Holy City. The court outside the temple was to be excluded from the measuring because "it has been given to the Gentiles." The outer court of the temple in Jerusalem was the only place outside the temple building where the Gentiles were allowed to enter. It is this area that Jesus cleansed twice (Matt. 21:12–17; John 2:13–22), so that the Gentiles could worship in peace. The Greek word ethnoi ("nations," "Gentiles") in Revelation refers to those not among God's people or those hostile to Him (11:18; 14:8; 16:19); this world was to belong to them. The Gentiles (or nations) were to trample the holy city underfoot for forty-two months. Jesus also predicted that Jerusalem would be trampled by the Gentiles "until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" (Luke 21:24), a prediction through which He made the trampling of Jerusalem a symbol of the persecution of God's people. Therefore, the trampling of the holy city in Revelation 11:2 refers to the persecution of God's people for a period of forty-two months (see 13:5–7) during the Middle Ages.

In Revelation, the time period of forty-two months (Rev. 11:2; 13:5) is the same as a time, times, and half a time (Dan. 7:25; cf. 12:7; Rev. 12:14) and 1,260 days (Rev. 11:3; 12:6) in Daniel. Prophetic days often stand as a symbol for years. Historicist interpreters have adopted the year A.D. 538 as the beginning of this prophetic period. By that time, the church had established itself as an ecclesiastical power and dominated the Western world throughout medieval times. In A.D. 1798, the prophetic period came to an end when the events of the French Revolution brought the church's long period of oppressive political power to its end.

11:3–6. The Two Witnesses. God was to empower His two witnesses to prophesy during the period of the 1,260 days (see v. 2). Ancient Israel's legal system required at least two witnesses to establish something as true (Deut. 19:15; John 8:17). Following that practice, Jesus sent His disciples out to preach the gospel (Mark 6:7; Luke 10:1). The concept of the two witnesses proclaiming the gospel points to the authenticity of the message.

The word "prophesy" brings to mind Revelation 10:11, where John was told that he would have to prophesy again concerning many nations. This shows that the commission to prophesy extended to the church. In the vision, the two witnesses were clothed in sackcloth, which was made of goat hair and was the usual attire of the Israelite prophets (e.g., 2 Kin. 1:8; Is. 20:2; Zech. 13:4), and in Revelation 11:10, the two witnesses are explicitly confirmed to be prophets. Sackcloth was also the garment of mourning (Gen. 37:34; Esth. 4:1–3). The portrayal of the two witnesses prophesying in sackcloth during the prophetic period of 1,260 days thus points to the difficult time God's people were to endure as they proclaimed the gospel message to the world.

Bittersweet Experience of God's End-Time People

John's bittersweet visionary experience is contextually related to the unsealing of Daniel's end-time prophecies and the proclamation that there would be no more time (Rev. 10:6). The content of the little scroll is related to the prophetic revelation John had been commissioned to communicate to God's people (Rev. 1:1). The prophet had faithfully fulfilled his prophetic task (1:2, 9), and he expected the conclusion of earth's history to occur with the blowing of the seventh trumpet. Before the end transpires, however, the gospel must be preached throughout the entire world (Rev. 14:6–7).

John's visionary experience had a deeper purpose. Since he represented the church that was commissioned with proclaiming the gospel, his visionary experience portrays that of God's end-time people as they go about realizing the task of preaching the gospel after the fulfillment of the 1,260-day prophetic period given in Daniel. After this prophetic period ended, those involved in the Millerite movement went through a bittersweet experience in 1844, which is in line with the bittersweet scroll that John consumed. The message of the soon coming of Christ was very sweet to them, but when the anticipated date passed without His return, the disappointed Millerites experienced the bitterness of the message they had proclaimed. Although disappointed and ridiculed, those who stayed firm saw in John's visionary experience the prophecy of their own situation. The command not to write down what he heard could be related to this bittersweet experience. Christ's commission to John to "prophesy again" to many peoples, nations, tongues or languages, and kings (Rev. 10:11) is the commission to God's end-time people to proclaim the message of the Second Coming in connection with the unsealed prophecies of the book of Daniel. It clearly corresponds to the messages of the three angels in Revelation 14:6–12.

John relates the two witnesses to several OT personalities. First, they are described as two olive trees and two lampstands that stand before God, the Lord of the earth. This is a reference to Zechariah's vision of the lampstand between the two olive trees (Zech. 4:2–3), the latter of which represented the two anointed ones, Joshua the high priest and Zerubbabel the governor of Judea, as they stood beside and served the Lord of the earth (Zech. 4:14). The activity of the two witnesses thus resembles Joshua and Zerubbabel in their priestly and royal roles.

Second, they are portrayed in terms of Elijah and Moses, the former of whom closed up the heavens so that it would not rain for three and a half years (1 Kin. 17) and called down fire from heaven on the soldiers who came to arrest him (2 Kin. 1:9–14). In the same manner, the two witnesses send fire from their mouths to destroy their enemies (v. 5) and have the power to withhold rain from the earth (v. 6). Just as Moses turned water into blood (Ex. 7:17–20) and struck the land of Egypt with various plagues, the two witnesses also have the power to turn water into blood and inflict any kind of plague. We must keep in mind that the two witnesses are not Moses and Elijah reincarnated but are symbolic figures. The same divine power that accompanied the prophetic activities of the two greatest prophets in Israel's history also accompanies the prophetic ministry of these two symbolic figures.

Who are these two witnesses? They represent the Bible (the OT and NT) as well as God's people in the OT and NT (see the use of the terms "witness" and "testimony" or "testify" in Matt. 24:14; John 5:39). Even though both Elijah and Moses were figures from the OT, it must be remembered the John the Baptist came in the spirit of Elijah (Luke 1:17), being the Elijah that was to come (Matt. 11:14). The proclamation of this divine word was entrusted to God's people. These two interpretations must not stand in opposition to each other. Revelation 11:8 identifies the two witnesses as one entity rather than two (the Greek reads "the dead body of them"). It is therefore appropriate to identify in the two witnesses the Bible and the people of God as they were to bear witness to the word of God during the prophetic period of the 1,260 days and again at the time of the end.

11:7–10. The Witnesses Killed. At the conclusion of the prophetic 1,260 days, the beast from the abyss would attack and kill the two witnesses from the previous section (v. 7). We already saw that the abyss or bottomless pit is the abode of Satan and the fallen angels (see commentary on Rev. 9:1–6). The beast that was to persecute the two witnesses arose from the very abode of Satan. This killing of the two witnesses thus aptly applies to the atheist assault against the Bible and the abolition of religion during the French Revolution at the conclusion of the 1,260-day prophetic period. The forces of atheism and secularism portrayed here are still alive throughout the world today.

The two witnesses were destined to lie publicly exposed on the street of the great city after their death (v. 8). This great city is identified as a territory governed by the beast that arose from the abyss at the end of the prophetic 1,260 days; as such, it should not be confused with end-time Babylon, the other great city of the end (14:8). This territory would have the spiritual characteristics of other ancient great cities: it would possess the wickedness and moral degradation of the inhabitants of Sodom (Gen. 19:4–11); would arrogantly reject the only true God, just like the king of Egypt during the Exodus (Ex. 5:2); and would embody the rebelliousness of God's professed people in Jerusalem, where the "Lord was crucified" (v. 8).

The body of the witnesses was to lay exposed and unburied for three and a half days, a period that first corresponds to the time Jesus spent in the tomb (see Matt. 12:40). The martyrdom and death of the two witnesses are linked in this way to the death of Christ. Second, historicist interpreters have usually identified this period as the years 1793–1797, during which the French government abolished religion and banned religious practices. The death of the two witnesses would cause great joy and gloating among those who dwelled on the earth (v. 10), which is a reference to the wicked (see 6:10). They would celebrate because these two prophets had tormented those living on the earth. The word of God always troubles the consciences of those who hear it but are unwilling to surrender themselves to it.

11:11–14. The Witnesses Resurrected. After three and a half days, God breathed life into the two witnesses and made them stand erect. The language used here echoes the creation of the first man in Genesis 2:7. This scene also recalls Ezekiel's vision of the valley of dry bones (Ezek. 37:1–10). Israel was perceived by their enemies as having been defeated and killed during the Babylonian exile, but, as Ezekiel prophesied, breath entered the dry bones and they returned to life and stood on their feet.

The astounding restoration of the witnesses to life filled their enemies with terror (v. 11). They thought they had silenced the witnesses that had tormented their consciences, but the word of God ultimately triumphed. In the sight of their enemies, the resurrected witnesses were then miraculously taken to heaven on a cloud (v. 12). This exaltation from their previous humiliated position added to the terror experienced by the earth dwellers.

Historically, one of the outcomes of the French Revolution was a great revival of interest in the Bible, manifested in particular by the establishment of numerous great Bible societies and missionary societies, which were founded to spread the gospel. The two witnesses thus came back to life, setting the stage for the gospel to be preached around the world like never before in history. The ascension of the resurrected witnesses was accompanied by a strong earthquake that struck a tenth of the city and killed seven thousand people. A tenth denotes a small part of a whole; the earthquake caused the collapse of only a part of the city. A second, more severe earthquake will later strike end-time Babylon, causing its total collapse (Rev. 16:18). The seven thousand people who were killed represent the fullness of the hardened unbelievers. The two witnesses, the Bible and the people of the Bible, were to be victorious.

The rest of the people reverently gave glory to the God of heaven (v. 13). This brings to mind the appeal of the first angel in Revelation 14:7 and shows that the vindication of the two witnesses parallels the proclamation of the eternal gospel from the first angel. As earth's history nears its end, the world will once again witness a global proclamation of the gospel. John saw that this final proclamation will illuminate the whole earth with the glory of the gospel message (18:1).

Revelation 11:3–14 describes the symbolic bitterness and pain experienced by God's people as they proclaim the gospel message to the world. While the testimony of the symbolic two witnesses applies historically to the Middle Ages and the atheism born out of the French Revolution, its significance goes beyond any temporal and geographic location. It shows that just as in the past, today God has people who are faithful in bearing witness of the gospel to the world. He uses them as He used Moses during the Exodus, Elijah during Israel's apostasy, and Joshua and Zerubbabel during the postexilic times.

11:15–18
The Seventh Trumpet

The sounding of the seventh trumpet signals the conclusion of this earth's history, the final woe, and the completion of God's mystery (see Rev. 10:7). The three woes work in a progression, each leading to the next. The first woe (the fifth trumpet; 9:1–11) dealt with the lack of a person's spiritual recognition of who they are (i.e., the self-sufficiency of the secularist movement). The second woe (the sixth trumpet; 9:12–21) dealt with the lack of a person's spiritual recognition of who God is (i.e., total rejection of God that leads to a life ruled by Satan and his atheistic philosophies). The third woe (the seventh trumpet; 11:15–18) is the natural result of those recognitions that will have a very real effect, eternal death, one thousand years after the first death at the Second Advent (20:5–6, 12–15).

11:15–17. The Announcement of God's Kingdom. In this vision, John heard loud voices in heaven declaring the ultimate establishment of God's kingdom on the earth, prophesying that His reign will last forever (v. 15). In response, the twenty-four elders (see Rev. 4:4) fell down before God and sang a hymn of praise for God's power and dominion (v. 17). This planet, which has been under Satan's dominion for many ages, is shown to finally return to God's full dominion and rule. After Christ's death on the cross and His ascension to heaven, Satan, the usurper, was totally deprived of any access to heaven and Christ was proclaimed to be the legitimate ruler of the earth (12:10). However, this rebellious world is still under Satan's dominion. Christ must reign as coruler with the Father until He has put His enemies under His feet, that is, defeated them (1 Cor. 15:25). Revelation proclaims at the sound of the seventh trumpet that God will ultimately reveal His great power.

11:18. The Mystery of God to Be Finished. The second part of the hymn sung by the twenty-four elders (v. 18) outlines the events of the second half of the book of Revelation: (1) Revelation 12–14 describes Satan and his two allies, the sea beast and the earth beast, uniting the nations of the world in their anger against God and His faithful people. (2) God will respond to the anger of the nations with His wrath, portrayed in terms of the seven last plagues, as described in Revelation 15–18. (3) The time for the judging of the dead is developed in Revelation 20:11–15. (4) The reward of the prophets and all of God's people is described in Revelation 21–22. (5) The destruction of those who destroy the earth is to be fulfilled by the destruction of Satan, his hosts, and their followers in the final act of the drama of the Great Controversy (19:11—20:15).

The expression "those who destroy the earth" does not primarily refer to ecological concerns related to the destruction of the earth by modern technology. Its meaning is rooted in two OT texts. First, in Hebrew, Genesis 6:12–13 identifies the antediluvians as the destroyers of the earth, who did so by filling the earth with iniquity; as a result, God destroyed them. Second, Jeremiah identifies historical Babylon as the destroying mountain that demolished the whole earth (Jer. 51:25–26). According to Revelation 19:2, end-time Babylon was to be judged because it had destroyed (phtheirō, "destroy," "ruin") the earth with its immorality. This shows that Revelation 11:18 refers to the activities of end-time Babylon, which fills the earth with sins that accumulate up to heaven (Rev. 18:5). Obviously, human sin and depravity have a negative impact on the environment.

Opening of the Ark of the Covenant

When the third vision concluded, God's temple in heaven was opened, enabling John to see the ark of the covenant in the Most Holy Place. The appearance of the ark of the covenant was accompanied by thunderclaps, rumbling voices, lightning flashes, an earthquake, and a severe hailstorm, representing the divine presence (Rev. 4:5; 8:5; 16:18; cf. Ex. 19:16–19; 20:18; Deut. 5:22–23). The mention of the ark of the covenant at the beginning of the new vision points to three things: First, in OT times, the ark of the covenant was the symbol of God's throne and of His covenant presence among His people. Thus, the reference to the ark of the covenant in Revelation 11:19 reminds God's end-time people that He will be with them up to the closing days of this earth's history.

Second, the opening of the Most Holy Place shows that the events in Revelation 12–20 are portrayed in the context of the new phase of Christ's ministry in the heavenly sanctuary, represented by the work of the high priest during the Day of Atonement, which can best be defined as the pre-Advent judgment (cf. Rev. 14:7). This judgment is introduced in Revelation 11:1–2 and takes place in the context of the eternal gospel (14:6–13). When this concludes, there will be a great separation between those who have chosen God and those who are lost (14:14–20). Christ will then come to give to every person according to his or her deeds (22:12; Rom. 2:6–11).

Third, the reference to the ark of the covenant reminds us of the tablets of the Ten Commandments, the Law of God, which reside inside it (see Ex. 25:16). This Law will play a significant role in the end-time events and is mentioned several times in the eschatological section of Revelation (e.g., 12:17; 14:12). As we will see, there are specific references to most of the commandments.

12:1—14:20
THE COSMIC CONFLICT AND ITS FINAL RESOLUTION

Revelation 12 describes a new vision that begins the eschatological portion of the book. The first half of Revelation describes the spiritual struggles of the church in a hostile world throughout its history while the focus of the second half of the book is primarily on the time of the end and the events leading to the return of Christ. Revelation 12 provides a summary of the cosmic conflict from its origin to the time of the remnant. John saw the dragon that would ally itself with the beast from the sea and the beast from the earth in an attempt to exterminate the remnant in the final conflict (Rev. 13). However, Revelation shows that God's remnant people would be safe on Mount Zion (14:1–5), gathered together through the results of the proclamation of the three angels' messages (14:6–12). At the Second Coming, the eschatological harvest will begin once the third angel's message has been completed (14:14–20).

12:1–17
The Woman, the Child, and the Dragon

This section consists of three parts: Satan's attempt to destroy Christ on earth (vv. 1–6), the expulsion of Satan and his angels from heaven (vv. 7–12), and Satan's efforts to destroy the church (vv. 13–17).

12:1–2. The Woman. John saw "a great sign" in heaven (v. 1; cf. 12:3; 15:1). The Greek word for "sign" (sēmeion) denotes a symbolic presentation of a real object. In reference to the woman, the word "sign" depicts her not as an actual woman but as a symbol of a spiritual reality.

In the Bible, a woman is often a symbol for God's people (e.g., Is. 54:5; Jer. 3:20; 2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:25–32). In the OT, when Israel is faithful to God, the nation is called a pure and faithful woman, while apostate and idolatrous Israel is portrayed as a prostitute. In the same way, in Revelation, God's faithful people are represented by a faithful woman (19:7–8; 22:17), while a prostitute symbolizes apostate and unfaithful people (17:1–6). In Revelation 12:1–5, the woman represents OT Israel as it brought the Messiah into the world, while in vv. 6 and 13–17, she represents the Israel that has faith in the Messiah, comprised of the Christian community. The use of one symbol emphasizes the continuity of God's people. John saw that the woman anguished in labor and was about to give birth to a child. The OT often depicts Israel as a beautifully adorned woman in travail (Is. 26:17–18; Jer. 4:31; Mic. 4:10), but in Revelation, the portrayal of a woman who endured the pangs of giving birth to the Messiah is primarily an allusion to Genesis 3:15. Revelation 12 shows the fulfillment of God's promise to redeem fallen humanity through the woman's offspring.

This woman was "clothed with the sun" (v. 1), stood on the moon, and had a crown or garland of twelve stars on her head, a vision that may be reminiscent of the portrayal of the radiance of Solomon's bride (Song 6:10). The sun, as the source of light, stands for the gospel message of salvation (2 Cor. 4:6) as presented in the Bible, and the moon reflects the light of the sun. Therefore, this woman was shown to be standing in the revelation of the OT that reflected the light of the gospel. The twelve stars on her head represent the twelve tribes of Israel as well as the twelve apostles (cf. 21:12, 14).

12:3–6. The Dragon. "Another sign appeared in heaven" (v. 3); this time, John saw a large red dragon with seven crowned heads and ten horns (v. 3). In Revelation 12:9, the dragon is identified as Satan, the ancient serpent of Genesis 3. In portraying Satan here in terms of the frightening appearance of an ancient mythological monster (i.e., a multiheaded serpent), the ferocity and viciousness of the archenemy of God is impressed on our minds.

The dragon had an earthly manifestation as his seven heads represent the kingdoms in history through which Satan worked to oppose God's plans and purpose in the world and to oppress His people (Rev. 17:9–11). The ten horns on the dragon's heads symbolize political authorities (17:12), and the seven crowns refer to Satan's false claim of lordship over this world (Luke 4:6). Here, Satan stood behind the Roman Empire as he tried to destroy the long-awaited Messiah. John added another identifying characteristic of the dragon: his tail dragged a third of the stars out of the heavens and hurled them to the earth (v. 4). In the Bible, the tail is a symbolic instrument of deception (Rev. 9:10). As he fell from his exalted position in heaven (Is. 14:12–15), Satan dragged a great number of heavenly angels down to the earth, all of whom became evil spirits (2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6).

In Revelation 12, Satan is pictured as waiting for the Messiah to be born in order to destroy Him (v. 4). He had been waiting since the time God announced the coming of the woman's offspring who would crush the serpent's head (Gen. 3:15). Eventually, the messianic child was born. He was to rule (lit., "shepherd") all nations with an iron scepter (v. 5) in fulfillment of Psalm 2:7–9, a reference to His judicial role (Rev. 19:15). However, the dragon was unable to kill Him because the Child was taken up to heaven, to God's throne (12:5), which refers to Christ's exaltation to the heavenly throne after His ascension to heaven (Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:22). This exaltation serves as an introduction to the subsequent scene (Rev. 12:7–12). As Christ was taken to heaven, the woman, signifying God's people on earth, were to find divine protection in the wilderness during the prophetic time of 1,260 days (v. 6).

12:7–12. War in Heaven. This section transitions to a new scene in the story. We are taken to the battle between good and evil at the moment war broke out in heaven between Michael and His angels and the dragon and his angels (v. 7). In the Bible, Michael ("who is like God") is identified as the chief prince (Dan. 10:13, 21; 12:1) and the archangel (Jude 9). He is the One who appeared to Joshua at Jericho as the commander of the heavenly host and is equated with the Lord Himself (Josh. 5:13–15). This leads to the conclusion that Michael is an eschatological name for Christ, who led the heavenly army in fighting against Satan. The devil and his forces eventually lost the battle and were expelled from heaven as a result, cast down to the earth.

The original battle is used to illustrate the final triumph of Christ over Satan at the cross. According to Revelation 12:10–12, whatever access Satan had to heaven ended after Jesus's ascension. He was first expelled from heaven at the beginning of the Great Controversy when he rebelled against God's government (Is. 14:12–15). By deceiving Adam, he usurped the rule and dominion of this earth (Luke 4:6) and became the ruler of this world (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11). However, he still had limited access to heaven after he was cast down to earth (Job 1:6–12; 2:1–7). The situation changed with the death of Jesus on the cross, when Satan's true character was revealed before the entire universe. Christ was exalted when the Father seated Him at His right hand in heaven (Eph. 1:20; cf. 1 Pet. 3:22) and proclaimed Him the legitimate ruler over the earth. Satan was unwilling to recognize Christ's authority and once again stood in open revolt against God. At that point, Satan was forever expelled from heaven. Jesus predicted this event when He stated that the cross was the time of the judgment of the world and the time when the ruler of this world would be thrown out (John 12:31). Since that time, Satan and the fallen angels have been confined to the earth as their prison until they receive their punishment (2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6). Satan no longer has access to the heavenly courts and he can no longer accuse God's people in heaven.

God's kingdom and Christ's authority were officially established with Satan's expulsion, for the accuser of God's people had been cast down (v. 10; cf. Job 1–2; Zech. 3). Victory over Satan is achieved only by virtue of Christ's substitutionary death (Rev. 5) and through the encouragement that comes from sharing Christ's triumph, regardless of the consequences (12:11). However, while Satan's fate was decided, his defeat was not yet complete as his claim to lordship over the earth still continued. Heaven therefore gave a warning to the earth and the sea, and the vision states that the devil has come down to them in fury, knowing his time is short (v. 12). The reference to the earth and the sea points to the global dimension of this warning; Satan's expulsion from heaven affected the entire earth. Chapter 13 is particularly significant in this regard, as it records how John saw Satan's two associates rise from out of the earth and the sea to cause the inhabitants of the earth to side with Satan in the final crisis. The fact that Satan's time is short (Gr. oligon; v. 12) means that his time is limited, just as a person who is sentenced to death realizes that he or she has only a short time despite the fact that the execution may take place many years from the present.

12:13–16. War on Earth. After his expulsion, Satan could no longer harm Christ, so he began to persecute Christ's church. However, the woman, who is a symbol of the church, was given the "two wings of a great eagle" so that she could fly to the wilderness and be cared for by God during the prophetic period of a time, times, and half a time (v. 14), or 1,260 days/years (A.D. 538–1798; see "The 1,260 Days/Years," p. 1037). The language used here comes from the Exodus event, when Israel left Egypt (Ex. 19:4). As God cared for Israel during those wilderness years (Deut. 8:15–18), so He cared for His faithful people during the Middle Ages. This is the same time during which the two witnesses bore their testimony to the gospel in sackcloth (Rev. 11:3) and the antichrist power persecuted God's faithful people (13:5), who took refuge in isolated places in order to escape persecution and the corrupted influences of the institutional church.

In his effort to destroy the woman, the serpent spewed a flooding river of water from his mouth (v. 15), an act that echoes the serpent's deceptive words in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3:1–5). In the OT, overflowing water is also often used as a symbol of the enemies of God's people attacking and destroying them (Ps. 69:1–2; 124:2–5; Is. 8:7–8; Jer. 47:2). The water that poured from the dragon's mouth thus points to both persecution and false teachings as the weapons Satan used against God's people during the 1,260-day prophetic period.

At this point in the vision, a new entity is introduced: the earth, which was friendly to the woman and swallowed the torrent of persecution and false teachings with which the dragon tried to destroy the woman. Once again, John used the language of the Exodus, alluding to when the earth swallowed the Egyptians who were pursuing the Israelites in an effort to destroy them (Ex. 15:12). The prophecy points here to a new territory that would provide protection for the church from Satan's efforts to destroy it at the conclusion of the prophetic 1,260-day period. However, this same territory was later to become the front line of the eschatological showdown, giving rise to the political power that would become Satan's agent in the final crisis (see Rev. 13:11–18).

12:17. Satan's Attack on the Remnant. This passage summarizes what comes next in the book, namely, Satan's final attack against God's end-time people (Rev. 13). The dragon became enraged with the woman and went to war with "the rest of her offspring" (12:17). The vision says Satan turned his fury against the remnant of the woman's offspring because at the time of the end, the church was eventually going to turn from its faithfulness to apostasy (see Rev. 17). Satan therefore went after what was left of the true people of God, the remnant that remained faithful to Christ.

The Greek word loipoi ("remnant," "remaining ones") describes the ones who remained faithful to God in comparison to the apostatized majority (1 Kin. 19:18; Rev. 2:24; 3:2–3). Revelation 12:17 announces that at the end of time, in the midst of global apostasy, there is to be a people who will remain faithful to Christ. They are described first of all as the ones who keep the commandments of God (see 14:12). Revelation 13 shows that at the end of time, the first four commandments of the Decalogue will be particularly central to the end-time conflict. Second, these people have Jesus's testimony, a phrase that in Revelation 19:10 is equated with the spirit of prophecy. In John's day, the expression "the spirit of prophecy" referred to the Holy Spirit speaking through prophets. Jesus's testimony thus refers to His witnessing to His people through the gift of prophecy, just as He did through John (Rev. 1:2). The book of Revelation therefore shows that at the time of the end, God's faithful people are to have the prophetic gift to guide and sustain them in the midst of satanic deception.

The Beast from the Sea

We must keep in mind that from this point on we are dealing primarily with prophecies yet to be fulfilled. While these prophecies tell us about what will happen at the time of the end, they do not tell us exactly when and how the final events will take place. We must therefore be careful not to speculate beyond what prophecy has revealed to us. A full understanding of the end-time prophecies will be possible only at the time of their fulfillment, not before.

Beginning with chapter 13, there is a shift in Satan's strategy in his attempts to win the people of the world for himself. Previously, Satan attacked the church primarily by means of persecution and coercion, and Revelation shows that in preparing for the final crisis he will expand his strategy from coercion to include deception. This shift in Satan's strategy corresponds to the basic transition from the historical to the eschatological focus of the book. While the word "deceive" does not occur at all in the historical section of Revelation (chaps. 4–11), it appears regularly in the eschatological section (chaps. 12–20) in descriptions of Satan's end-time activities in preparation for the final crisis.

Revelation 13–20 portrays Satan's endeavors to win the world's allegiance by launching a great counterfeit of the true God and His salvific activities in the world. Revelation 13 describes a triune league formed between the dragon and his two allies: the sea beast (13:1–10) and the earth beast (13:11–18). This diabolic triumvirate is to stand as an antithesis to the Trinity of the Godhead (1:4–6). Throughout the rest of the book, the members of this satanic triad are inseparably associated in the opposition of God's activities in the world and the deception that leads people to turn away from God and side with Satan in the final crisis (16:13–14; 19:20; 20:10).

The Sea Beast and the Little Horn of Daniel

There is a long account of historicist interpretation regarding the identity of the beast from the sea. This identification often uses lists, which vary in length, of characteristics shared by both this beast and the little horn of Daniel 7. Here, we provide six shared characteristics: both the fourth beast (Rome) of Daniel 7 and the first beast in Revelation 13 came out of the sea, symbolizing the stormy social and political conditions of human society; both beasts had ten horns (Dan. 7:7; Rev. 13:1), symbolizing the people groups that arose and displaced the Romans (for more on the identification of the ten horns, see commentary on Dan. 7:1–8); the sea beast had characteristics like the first three beasts (lion, bear, leopard; Rev. 13:2) that came before the fourth beast of Daniel 7; the sea beast had seven heads (Rev. 13:1), representing the powers used by Satan to persecute God's people throughout history (see 17:9–11); the sea beast had blasphemous names on each head (Rev. 13:1), pointing to the divine title the beast blasphemously claimed (see 13:5–6) in addition to speaking blasphemies (13:5), which is one of the chief characteristics of the little horn of Daniel 7 (Dan. 7:25; cf. 7:8, 11, 20); and finally, both the sea beast and the little horn wage war against God's people for 1,260 years (Rev. 13:5, 7; Dan. 7:21, 25 ; see "The Sea Beast and the 1,260 Days/Years," p. 1976). The sea beast thus corresponds to the little horn of Daniel 7, which was prophesied to rise from among the ten horns of the fourth beast (vv. 8, 23–25).

13:1–4. Description of the Beast. Some manuscripts read "I stood," which suggests that John stood on the seashore as he watched the beast come out of the water. However, the best Greek manuscripts read "he stood," referring to the dragon. John therefore saw the dragon on the seashore as a monstrous beast (Gr. thērion, denoting a savage beast) came out of the sea. In the Bible, the beast is a symbol of a political power, while the sea symbolizes the stormy social and political conditions in the world following the downfall of the Roman Empire (cf. Dan. 7:2–3).

John described the beast as it emerged from the water, saying it had ten horns and seven heads. This description mirrors that of the dragon in Revelation 12:3, showing that this power is a true representative of the dragon. The heads of the beast are the powers Satan has used to persecute God's people throughout history (see 17:9–11), and the blasphemous names on them point to the divine names the beast claims to have (see 13:5–6). The ten horns point to Daniel 7 and symbolize the nations that sprung out of the Roman Empire after its demise (Dan. 7:24). The horns in Revelation 13 have royal crowns to show that the power represented by the sea beast appears at the point in history when those nations reign. The sea beast thus corresponds to the little horn of Daniel 7.

As the beast finally stepped out of the water, John saw parts resembling a leopard, a bear, and a lion (v. 2). This beast combined the characteristics of the four beasts that came out of the sea in Daniel 7:2–8 and that represent four earthly kingdoms: Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome (Dan. 7:17; see "The Sea Beast and the Little Horn of Daniel," p. 1974).

The dragon gave the beast his power, throne, and great authority (v. 2b). Here we see an enthronement scene replicating the enthronement of Christ (chap. 5). Just as John saw in vision that the Father had given His throne and authority to Christ (Rev. 2:27), the dragon established the beast as his coregent and representative on earth. This affirms the status of this symbolic sea beast as the second member of the satanic trinity that was trying to take the place of Jesus Christ in the minds and hearts of the people.

The beast has three phases of existence, the first of which ended when one of the beast's heads was mortally wounded. This mirrors the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, as the Greek word sphazō is used for both the wounding of the beast and the death of Christ (Rev. 5:6). However, the mortal wound was eventually healed and the beast was restored (13:3), resulting in the amazement of the inhabitants of the earth. In admiration, they worshiped both the dragon that stood behind the beast and the beast itself, and in asking two rhetorical questions, the earth's inhabitants implied that no one was like the beast and that no one could defeat him. Their question "Who is like the beast?" stands in contrast to the question "Who is like God?" (cf. Ex. 15:11; Mic. 7:18), the latter of which refers to the incomparability of God. It is also a counterpart to the name Michael (Rev. 12:7), which in Hebrew means "Who is like God?" This ally of Satan is a true counterfeit of Jesus Christ in the final crisis.

13:5–10. Activities of the Beast. Having portrayed the beast in physical terms, John next turned to describing the beast's activities in terms of a mouth speaking great, boastful things and blasphemies (v. 5). In the NT, blasphemy denotes a claim of equality with God (Matt. 26:63–65; John 10:33) or the appropriation of God's prerogatives (Mark 2:7). The sea beast claimed the titles of God and the prerogatives that belong to God alone. In the prophecy, the beast was allowed time to exercise its authority for forty-two months or 1,260 days/years (A.D. 538–1798; see Rev. 11:2; see "The Sea Beast and the 1,260 Days/Years," p. 1976). These activities of the beast echo the activities of the antidivine power of the little horn that came out of the fourth beast in Daniel 7.

John saw that the blasphemies of the sea beast were directed against God, more specifically His name, His "tabernacle" or "dwelling place," and those who live in heaven (see v. 6). The dwelling of God is the sanctuary in heaven where Christ ministers on behalf of His people (e.g., Heb. 8:1–2). The sea beast denied Christ's mediatory work in the heavenly sanctuary by substituting it with a human system that administers salvation and forgiveness of sins. In Revelation, God's people are considered to be residents of heaven (Rev. 14:1; cf. Eph. 2:6; Col. 3:1–3) in contrast to the unfaithful who are regularly spoken of as those on the earth. The sea beast was allowed to wage war against God's people and to overcome them (see below, "The Sea Beast and the 1,260 Days/Years").

Once the beast was restored to power, the inhabitants of the world were filled with awe and admiration (v. 8). At this point, there is a switch from the past to the future tense, pointing to the time of the end. The resurrection of the beast was to win the allegiance of the whole world.

Having described the sea beast and his activities, John exhorts people to heed the message: captivity and the sword are God's punishments for those who have oppressed His people (v. 10; cf. Jer. 15:2; 43:11). The sea beast was eventually to receive retribution proportionate to the harm it had done to God's people (Rev. 19:20–21). This provides incentive for the patience and the faith of the saints. At this point, a question arises: how would the beast be healed? The answer is provided in the rest of chapter 13.

The Beast from the Earth

The focus of the vision shifts to Satan's second ally in the final crisis, who was to play a key role in the healing of the sea beast's deadly wound.

13:11. Description of the Beast. John saw another beast appear on the scene and used two Greek words to describe it: allos, meaning "another of the same kind," and thērion, which denotes a savage beast and is the same word used in the description of the first beast. This shows that the earthly power introduced here was of the same kind as the previous one. This time, John saw the beast come up out of the earth rather than the sea. The fact that Satan's two allies rose from the sea and the earth, respectively, points to the worldwide scope of Satan's end-time activities: woe was pronounced on both the sea and the earth, because the devil went down to them in fury (Rev. 12:12). The earth from which the second beast came is the same earth that saved the woman or church from the flooding waters of the dragon at the conclusion of the prophetic period of 1,260 days (Rev. 12:14–16). The power represented by the earth beast appeared in a territory friendly to the church and was a new player on the scene. While the sea beast had a long history, no history of the activities of the earth beast is mentioned. It arose to world power after the sea beast received the deadly wound during the events of the French Revolution. The earth beast thus functions as a power exclusive to the end times.

The Sea Beast and the 1,260 Days/Years

The text of Revelation shows that the power represented by the sea beast was to appear on the world scene as the successor of the Roman Empire and to exercise its authority and power during the prophetic 1,260 days, which is the same period of time the little horn of Daniel 7 was active (see "The Little Horn in Daniel 7," p. 1035, and "The 1,260 Days/Years," p. 1037). The only period that fits this time frame well is the Middle Ages, when many experienced religious oppression from the established church in Western Europe. Revelation 13 is a prophecy that depicts this major apostasy in the history of the Christian church—the one foretold by Paul in 2 Thessalonians 2:3–12.

Historicist interpreters have accepted the year A.D. 538 as the beginning of the prophetic period of forty-two months or 1,260 days/years, during which the state church of Western Europe shifted the position and prerogatives of God to the pope. In an encyclical letter entitled "The Reunion of Christendom," released on June 20, 1894, Pope Leo XIII reiterated these claims, saying, "We [the popes] hold upon this earth the place of God Almighty." The atoning ministry of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary was replaced by the church's priesthood, which claimed to possess the ability to forgive sins. All those who insisted on living by the Bible rather than by the state religion experienced persecution and martyrdom. History testifies that millions of Christians paid with their lives for their faithfulness to the teachings of the Bible. In modern times, characterized by ecumenism and religious tolerance, such statements are regarded as harsh, but present attitudes cannot erase historical facts.

However, the events of the French Revolution inflicted on the beast the deadly wound that brought the church's oppressive rule to an end. The year 1798 thus aptly marked the conclusion of the 1,260-day prophetic period. The state-instituted religion and the traditional God-centered theology that dominated the Western world for centuries were replaced with a human-centered philosophy and materialistic worldview. Revelation 13 shows, however, that the religious-political power that ruled during the Middle Ages was to rise again and exercise its oppressive power over the world at the time of the end.

In contrast to the terrifying appearance of the first beast, the earth beast seemed harmless, complete with two horns like those belonging to a lamb. In Revelation, the lamb is a symbol that is used to represent Christ only. This shows that this end-time power is Christlike in appearance and is friendly to God's people. The text shows, however, that this power would eventually begin to display a satanic spirit as it began to speak like the dragon. The dragon-like speech is a reference to the deceptive and seductive words of the serpent in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3:1–5). This end-time power would be instrumental in inducing the whole world to worship the first beast that received the deadly wound.

The only world power that appeared in history in the postmedieval period that fits the description of the earth beast is Protestant America. Revelation 13 shows that the United States of America, which in the postmedieval period provided protection for and was a safe haven to the church, is to play a key role in last-day events.

13:12–13. Activities of the Beast. At this point, there is a change in tenses in the original Greek language from past to present, bringing us to the closing days of this world's history. The second beast began to exercise all the authority of the first. This end-time earthly power is an exact parody of the Holy Spirit; just as the Holy Spirit exercised the authority of Christ, pointing people to Him (John 15:26; 16:13–14), the earth beast will exercise all the authority of the sea beast, pointing people to it. The expression "authority of the first beast" (v. 12) refers to the coercive power that the medieval church exercised during the prophetic 1,260 days of the Middle Ages (see Rev. 13:5–8).

By exercising the authority of the first beast, the earth beast will cause the inhabitants of the world to worship the first beast, whose mortal wound will be healed (v. 12). The work of causing the inhabitants of the earth to worship the first beast correlates with the healing of the deadly wound of the sea beast. The earth beast will cause the people of the world to worship the sea beast initially through the use of miraculous signs as a means of persuasion (Rev. 13:13–14), and later, through coercion (13:15–17).

The earth beast will perform great signs, by which it will deceive the nations of the earth (see 2 Thess. 2:9–10). In contrast to the Holy Spirit, who moves people to worship Christ through miraculous signs, this end-time power will deceive the people of the world through deceptive miracles and will cause them to worship the sea beast. The greatest of these deceptive signs is making fire come down from heaven in an imitation of the prophetic role of Elijah on Mount Carmel (1 Kin. 18:36–38), living up to its moniker of the false prophet who works miracles on the sea beast's behalf (Rev. 16:13; 19:20; 20:10). The act of bringing fire down from heaven also mimics the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:3). All the activities of the earth beast will be designed to make people believe that these miraculous signs are the manifestations of true divine power.

13:14–15. The Image of the Beast. The healing of the sea beast will result in the restoration of the medieval political-religious system of worship. As previously indicated, the earth beast will deceive the inhabitants of the earth through miraculous signs. The people will accept those deceptive miracles as the manifestations of divine power due to the lamblike horns of the beast's appearance. The false prophet will persuade them to make an image, which is a copy of some reality, to the beast that received the deadly wound. The world will be enticed into creating a system of state religion that resembles the one from the period of oppression described prophetically as the forty-two months or 1,260 days. When civil and political powers join the leading religious organizations to force religion on people, they will have formed the image of the beast. However, images lack life (e.g., Ps.

135:15–17), and the earth beast therefore gives breath to the image of the beast to give it life. This brings Genesis 2:7 to mind, where, after having created Adam in His image, God breathed life into him, enabling him to function. By means of political power and a death threat, the earth beast persuades the people of the world to acknowledge the authority of the sea beast and to render allegiance to it.

Revelation 13 thus indicates that Protestant America (the earth beast) will have the leading role in the healing of the deadly wound of the papal system (the sea beast). At the time of the end, it will establish a union with the sea beast and establish an institution similar to the one that characterized medieval Christianity in Western Europe for the purpose of controlling the consciences and beliefs of the people of the world. The impact of the earth beast will be worldwide.

13:16–17. The Mark of the Beast. All who succumb to the pressure will receive a mark with the name of the beast on their right hand or on their forehead, regardless of class. To receive the mark of the beast means to belong to the beast and to worship it. The mark of the beast is the antithesis of the seal of God; just as the seal identifies those who belong to and worship God (Rev. 14:1), so the mark of the beast identifies those who belong to and worship the beast. The placement of a mark on the right hand or forehead evokes Deuteronomy 6:8, where Moses instructed the Israelites to bind God's law as a sign on their hand or their forehead. This shows that the mark on the forehead has to do with impressing God's law on the minds and behavior of His people through belief. In contrast, receiving the mark of the beast stands as a mark of refusal of God's commandments, exchanging obedience to God for obedience to the human commandments of the beast.

Revelation shows that the central issues in the final crisis will be worship and obedience to God in keeping His commandments (Rev. 14:12), with the Sabbath commandment being the most important and revealing test of one's faithfulness to God. The appeal of the three angels' messages to worship and obey the true God (14:7) rather than to worship the beast and receive its mark (14:9) clearly appears in the context of the Sabbath commandment. As the Sabbath is the distinctive sign of obedience of God's faithful people (Ex. 31:12–17; Ezek. 20:12, 20), so the mark of the beast is a sign of obedience to the beast. The mark of the beast is a direct attack on the fourth commandment, as it is a human substitute for God's commandment. The most obvious example of this is the establishment of Sunday, the first day of the week, as a day of worship in place of the seventh-day Sabbath (see below, "The Law and the Sabbath").

The Law and the Sabbath

The Law of God is of central significance in the book of Revelation. A principal characteristic of God's end-time people is that they keep His commandments (Rev. 12:17; 14:12). In the OT, the Sabbath commandment lies at the heart of the Decalogue as a seal, since the seventh-day Sabbath was a visible sign of loyalty to the one true God and of the special relationship between Him and His covenant people (Ex. 31:12–17; Ezek. 20:12, 20). The two versions of the Decalogue given in Exodus and Deuteronomy show that the Sabbath was to be a constant reminder to Israel of God as their Creator (Ex. 20:11) and their Savior (Deut. 5:15). Sabbath observance was an indication of submission and belonging to God.

Revelation shows that just as the Sabbath was the sign of faithfulness to God in the OT, so the Sabbath will once again be the distinctive sign of obedience and submission to God in the end times. This will distinguish God's end-time people from those who will choose the false apostate religious system and receive the mark of the beast on their right hand and forehead. Receiving the mark of the beast echoes Moses's instruction to the Israelites to bind God's commandments on the right hand or the forehead (Deut. 6:8). Receiving the mark of the beast thus functions as a similar sign of obedience to the end-time apostate religious system rather than obedience to God in keeping His commandments.

This concept is emphasized in the three angels' messages, which contain a call to the inhabitants of the earth to fear and worship the creator God followed by a warning to those who choose to worship the beast and receive its mark (14:7–12). This call to worship the creator God is given in the language of the fourth commandment of the Decalogue (v. 7; cf. Ex. 20:11). Relating the call to worship the true God with the Sabbath commandment and the warning not to worship the beast and receive its mark establishes the reception of the mark of the beast as a direct attack on the fourth commandment, the true Sabbath. That the mark has something to do with God's law is obvious from the concluding statement that describes God's people as those who maintain faithfulness to Christ and keep God's commands (Rev. 14:12).

However, Sunday observance today does not in and of itself determine that one will receive the mark of the beast. Sunday-keeping will become the mark of the beast only when people clearly understand the issues involved in choosing a day of worship. The time is coming when the mark of the beast will become the central issue of the Great Controversy; when every person in the world will have to take his or her stand for or against God's will.

Revelation 13:17 shows that at the climax of the end-time drama, economic sanctions for those who refuse to worship the image of the beast will play a pivotal role. Refusal to worship the beast will be treated as an act of disloyalty punishable by death. All of this is a result of Satan's age-old desire to be the sole ruler of this world, an aspiration that cannot be realized as long as there are people who refuse to acknowledge his rule. This entire scenario will conclude with the coming of Christ in power and glory, followed by the defeat of the satanic triune league and their forces (19:11–21) and the deliverance of His faithful people (Dan. 12:1).

Much of the language in Revelation 13:14–18 echoes Daniel 3, which records how Nebuchadnezzar forced image worship on his people: the image and worshiping the image (Dan. 3:5), the death threat for not worshiping the image (3:6), the universality of the scene (3:2), and the number six in regard to the image (3:1). Revelation 13 tells us that the story of Daniel 3 is to be repeated at the time of the end on a worldwide scale, when people will have to choose between worshiping the image or remaining faithful to God.

13:18. The Number 666. Revelation 13 concludes with a call to the reader to understand the number of the beast, 666, and a declaration that special wisdom and insight are needed to cultivate an understanding (see also 17:9). The wisdom in view here does not refer to intellectual ability but to divine discernment imparted by the Holy Spirit (Prov. 2:6; James 1:5). God's end-time people need divinely bestowed wisdom in order to discern the deceptive character of the beast and to be protected from the end-time deceit. Those who lack this wisdom will become victims of the duplicity and will worship the beast (see 2 Thess. 2:10–12; Rev. 13:8).

The book defines 666 as "the number of a man." The Greek phrase arithmos anthrōpou means "the number of humanity," like in Revelation 21:17 where metron anthrōpou means "human measurement." The beast of Revelation 13 does not represent a human being but a religious-political system that stands in opposition to God. Numbers regularly have symbolic meanings in Revelation, and in the Bible at large, seven expresses the perfection of God. Being one short of seven, six represents how humanity falls short of divine perfection based on the fact that human beings were created on the sixth day, a day prior to the completion of the full week of seven days. Human beings find their purpose only in the number seven, in acknowledging God as their Creator and Redeemer. The number 666 thus refers to humanity apart from God.

Six hundred and sixty-six applies exclusively to the time of the end. It refers to the sea beast in association with the earth beast and the dragon. In Greek, 666 is expressed as hexakosioi hexēkonta hex. Although it must be remembered that in the Greek it is expressed as the single number six hundred and sixty-six rather than as six, six, six, this trifold emphasis on "six" identifies the satanic triune league—the dragon, the sea beast, and the earth beast—as the counterfeit of the Trinity of the Godhead (see Rev. 1:4–6; see commentary on Rev. 13:1–10). As applied to the beast, 666 refers to the rebellious system that opposes God and exalts itself above God by claiming His titles and prerogatives (13:6–8; cf. 2 Thess. 2:4). This system is nothing more than a human institution that falls short of the divine character. God's message to this system is the same as the one to the king of Tyre in OT times: "You are a man and not God" (cf. Ezek. 28:9). Such an identification of this end-time antichrist system requires divine wisdom rather than intellectual cleverness and calculation.

The only other place in the Bible where the number 666 is found is in 1 Kings 10:14, where King Solomon's annual income is specified as 666 talents of gold. Right after this text, we see that Solomon turned away from God as he began to accumulate gold in his palace, multiply his chariots and horsemen, and marry many foreign wives, all of which were direct violations of God's instructions to Israelite kings (Deut. 17:16–17). In disobeying divine instruction, King Solomon became filled with pride and arrogance and turned to serve images of other gods, thus leading people away from God. The number 666 thus expresses human attempts at success without God.

In Revelation, 666 denotes an apostate system, which, like Solomon, was once faithful to God but eventually turned away from him. At the time of the end, this system, like Solomon, will lead the people of the world away from God. All those who receive the mark of the beast, which consists of the name of the beast and the number of its name, will side with an apostate system like Babylon of old that exalts itself above God and tries to take His place in the world.

The Victorious 144,000

As a result of Satan's intense activities in the closing days of earth's history, the whole world will be led to follow the beast (Rev. 13:8). However, during these perilous times, God will have a faithful remnant who will remain loyal and obedient to Him. They will be in Zion under the protection of God and the Lamb.

14:1–3. The New Song. The scene returns to the throne room where John saw the Lamb standing on Mount Zion with the 144,000 (see Rev. 7:4). In the OT, Mount Zion stood as the center of God's rule on earth (Ps. 48:1–3; Mic. 4:7), where God's people were secure from their enemies. The 144,000 were seen gathered under the banner of Christ. In contrast to the followers of the beast, who had the mark of the beast on their right hand or their forehead, John saw that the faithful had the Father's name written on their foreheads alone. They were sealed with the seal of protection. Since the name of God represents His character (Ex. 33:19; 34:6–7), the seal indicates that they reflected God's character in their lives.

John heard the righteous singing "a new song before the throne" (v. 3). It was the same song of deliverance sung by Israel after passing through the Red Sea (Ex. 15), though here it was sung by those who had gone through the great tribulation of the final crisis (Rev. 7:14). Only the 144,000 were able to learn that song, because it reflected their own experience. They stood firm in the midst of end-time deception and were delivered (see Dan. 12:1); hence, no other group in all creation was able to learn this song.

The Number of the Beast's Name

Throughout Christian history, numerous proposals have been put forward regarding the meaning of 666. One line of interpretation has been to assign roman numerals to various names or titles and find the sum and thus the number of the beast's name. Since the seventeenth century, this number has commonly been applied to the Latin title vicarivs filii dei (Vicar of the Son of God) under the assumption that it is an official papal title. We suggest a way of interpreting the number that seems to fit the biblical context better and that recognizes that applying 666 to the Latin phrase vicarivs filii dei can be problematic.

First, although some popes have occasionally been referred to as vicarivs filii dei in the past, there is no documented evidence that this has ever been an official papal title. Second, although Revelation encourages readers or hearers to calculate the number of the beast, which is specifically identified as the number 666 (13:18) immediately followed by the phrase "number of his [or its] name" (13:17), it does not at any point indicate that we ought to attach numerical value to the letters of a name. This has been the assumption. The Greek word translated "to calculate," psēphizō, means here "to figure out" (cf. Luke 14:28). For example, the 144,000 are described as having the name of God on their foreheads (14:1, 3), but no one has used mathematical calculations to interpret the number.

Third, the text does not specify which language ought to be used to interpret the name of the beast. In Revelation, when a name has a special meaning, the language is regularly specified as being either "in Hebrew" (9:11; 16:16) or "in Greek" (9:11). Latin is not used in Revelation; there is no indication that 666 is to be decoded in this language using Roman numerals as has been done with the Latin title vicarivs filii dei. Fourth, Revelation 13 shows that 666 applies exclusively to the end time in connection with the healing of the mortal wound of the sea beast as the earth beast causes the earth's inhabitants to receive the mark of the beast. Applying 666 to a Medieval Latin title does not fit the end-time context. It is obvious that we must wait for the interpretation, for only time will reveal the full meaning of this symbolic number.

14:4–5. Characteristics of the 144,000. The 144,000 are described first as virgins who have not defiled themselves with women. This defilement must be taken symbolically. In OT times, Israelite soldiers were required to keep themselves pure and to refrain from having sexual relations with women before going into battle (Deut. 23:9–11; 1 Sam. 21:4–5). Revelation speaks of how the harlot Babylon and her daughters, the apostate churches (Rev. 17:5), have seduced others into illicit relationships with them (17:1–5; 18:3, 9). The 144,000 are portrayed as militant troops who fight against Satan and his army (cf. 7:4–8) before the Second Coming and who have remained out of relationship with Babylon and her daughters and therefore spiritually undefiled, steadfastly faithful to one Husband: Christ (2 Cor. 11:2).

Second, they are described as the ones who will follow the Lamb wherever He goes. They will remain unwavering in their faithfulness to Christ, in contrast to the world, which chooses to follow the beast. Third, the 144,000 are said to be the ones who were redeemed from among humanity as the "firstfruits" to God and the Lamb (v. 4), referring to how in ancient Israel, the firstfruits belonged to God as the best of the harvest. John saw that the 144,000, purchased by the blood of Christ and as the firstfruits of the harvest, were standing on Mount Zion (Rev. 14:1–5). This implies that the harvest includes many others, redeemed by Christ throughout human history. Finally, this group is described as having uttered no falsehood and as being blameless (v. 5), which echoes Zephaniah's prophecy about the remnant of Israel, who would not lie or practice evil (3:13). The falsehoods allude to Satan's end-time deceptions (Rev. 13:14). While many choose to believe the lies, God's end-time people love of the truth and persist in abiding by it (2 Thess. 2:10–11).

The Greek word amōmos ("blameless," "without fault") in v. 5 does not refer to a moral, sinless status but rather to the fidelity of the 144,000 to Christ. While the former is true of the 144,000, it is not a characteristic exclusive to the last generation of saints. In the OT, Abraham (Gen. 17:1) and Job (Job 1:1) were blameless, but they were not sinless. Two thousand years ago, Christians were called to be holy and blameless before God (Eph. 1:4; 5:27; Phil. 2:15; Col. 1:22; Jude 24). Revelation presents the 144,000 as reflecting the true character of Christ. Because their robes were made white in the Lamb's blood, they are found spotless and blameless before God (2 Pet. 3:14).

The Three Angels' Messages

This section describes John's prophetic vision of the three vocal angels that were to fly in the sky and proclaim warnings to the inhabitants of the world. It is in response to these messages that the 144,000 were to be gathered from the nations of the world. The Greek word angelos means "messenger" and is often translated as "angel." In the Bible, angels often represent human beings in the service of God (Mal. 2:7; Matt. 11:10). Revelation 14:12 clearly links the three angels to God's end-time people.

14:6–7. The First Angel's Message. The first angel proclaimed the everlasting gospel (Gr. euangelion, "good news") to the inhabitants of the earth. The fact that the gospel the angel proclaimed is specifically called "everlasting" shows that this is the gospel of salvation, which contains both salvation and judgment. It is the good news of salvation for those who accept it, but it is judgment for those who reject it. The proclamation of the end-time gospel is worldwide in scope and is to be proclaimed to every nation, tribe, language (lit., "tongue"), and people. This angel was doing what God's people are commissioned to do (see Rev. 10:11) and is necessary because at the time of the end, the beast will offer humans its wine (14:8) and will exercise its Satan-delegated authority over every nation, tribe, language, and people (13:7). Just as Satan's deceptive activities are worldwide, so is the proclamation of the gospel in the end times.

The angel proclaimed the message with a loud voice, for it is an urgent message that concerns the eternal destiny of every single person. It consists of two exhortations, the first of which is to fear God and give Him glory. In Revelation, fearing God and giving Him glory always go together (11:13; 15:4). While the former designates a right relationship with God, the latter primarily denotes obedience to Him. God's end-time people are the ones who have reverence for God (11:18; 19:5). To fear God means to take Him seriously and acknowledge Him for who He is. It denotes a right relationship with Him and a full surrender to His will (Gen. 22:12; Job 1:8–9). Those who revere God live a life that glorifies Him by their obediently keeping His commandments (Deut. 5:29; 13:4; Eccl. 12:13; John 15:8). In Revelation, God's end-time people are characterized by their close relationship with Jesus Christ and their diligence in keeping all of His commandments (Rev. 12:17; 14:12).

We are to fear God and give Him glory because the hour of His judgment has come (v. 7). This echoes the words of Solomon when he refers to the importance of revering God and keeping His commands and when he states the fact that God will bring every action into judgment (Eccl. 12:13–14). This first message was a declaration that the judgment announced in Daniel 7:9–10, 26, the pre-Advent judgment that takes place just prior to the Second Coming, had just begun (cf. Dan. 8:13–14). The results of this judgment will be realized after the Millennium in the final judgment of the wicked (Rev. 20:11–15). Its purpose is to reveal the righteousness of God in saving His people and the final destiny of every human being (22:11). In Revelation, judgment is a part of the gospel. To God's people, judgment means vindication and salvation, but to the unbelieving it means condemnation. It is to the latter that the messages of the three angels are directed, calling them to worship the living God and offering them an opportunity to repent and turn to God (cf. 2 Pet. 3:9).

The second exhortation is to worship God, Maker of heaven, earth, the sea, and springs of water (Rev. 14:7; cf. Acts 14:15). Worship is central in the final confrontation between Christ and Satan. There will be only two groups in the time of the end: those who fear and worship God and those who fear and worship the beast. Revelation thus highlights the radical polarization of humanity.

True worship in the Bible is associated with the correct day of worship, a fact that is emphasized by how the call of the first angel to worship God the Creator directly alludes to the fourth commandment of the Decalogue (Ex. 20:11; see "The Law and the Sabbath," p. 1978). The call of the first angel to worship God the Creator is given in the context of Sabbath observance. The seventh-day Sabbath is a special sign of our relationship with God (Ex. 31:13; Ezek. 20:12, 20). The first angel's message prophesies that at the time of the end, the truth about God the Creator will once more be proclaimed to the world. This truth will counter Satan's deceptive activities, which lead the world into the false religion of serving the counterfeit god (2 Thess. 2:4).

14:8. The Second Angel's Message. The second angel announced the fall of the great city Babylon, which in Revelation is a symbol rooted in historical Babylon as the power that opposed God and oppressed His people. According to the Bible, Babylon was characterized by arrogance and rebellion against God from its very beginning (Gen. 11:1–9). Isaiah 14:12–15 equates Babylon with Satan and his attempt to make himself equal to God. In Revelation, end-time Babylon is a symbol of the satanic trinity: Satan, the sea beast, and the earth beast. Revelation prophesies that this satanic league will unite apostate religious powers under its auspices, which are referred to as Babylon's daughters (17:5). These daughters put themselves in Satan's service in opposing God and His people (see 13:11–18). Like Babylon of old, it is to exalt itself above God, seeking to occupy the place of God. The message of the second angel provides assurance to God's people that this wicked system will not last long. The twofold repetition of the word "fallen" (v. 8) points to the certainty of Babylon's end. Already fallen, it will soon come to its end, just as the Babylon of old (Is. 21:9; Jer. 51:8).

Babylon is judged because she made all nations drink her intoxicating wine of adultery. Jeremiah talks of Babylon having intoxicated the nations of the earth (Jer. 51:7). Revelation 17 pictures end-time Babylon as a prostitute who made all nations drink her wine and seduced them into illicit relationships with her (see 17:2), and Revelation 13 presents the satanic trinity's deception and seduction as they trick the people of the world into worshiping the beast and its image (vv. 11–18). The seduced nations will join end-time Babylon for economic security (18:3, 9–19), the medieval system of state-sponsored religion will be restored, and the mortal wound of the beast will be healed. The newly established religious-political union will enforce a false religion—a false gospel that controls people's consciences and conduct.

14:9–11. The Third Angel's Message. The message of the third angel gives a serious warning to those who choose to worship the beast and its image and who receive the mark on their forehead or their right hand. It presents all those who choose to drink Babylon's wine (14:8) as having to drink the wine of God's anger from the cup of His indignation. This wine is poured out in full strength (lit., "mixed unmixed"), meaning undiluted in the cup. In the OT, drinking wine from the Lord's cup is a frequent symbol of the execution of God's wrath (e.g., Job 21:20; Ps. 75:8; Is. 51:17–23). In ancient times, wine was often diluted with water to reduce its strength. Undiluted wine was supplemented with various herbs and spices to increase its intoxicating strength. This may be the meaning here, although it could also mean it is poured out unmixed with water. The undiluted wine represents the execution of God's wrath in its full strength, unmixed with mercy. The psalmist applies this metaphor to divine judgment (Ps. 75:8). This drinking of the undiluted cup of God's wrathful wine is portrayed in Revelation in terms of the seven last plagues (Rev. 16:19).

The third angel's message proclaims that all who worship the beast and its image and receive its mark will be further tormented with fire and brimstone, meaning burning sulfur, before the angels and the Lamb. In the OT, fire and brimstone is a symbol of judgment (Gen. 19:24; Is. 34:8–10). Revelation 14:11 declares that the smoke of the destruction of the wicked will ascend forever and that they will have no rest day and night. This is well-known language in the Bible. Isaiah prophesied that Edom would be destroyed by fire and brimstone and become a burning pitch that would not be quenched night or day; its smoke would rise up forever (34:9–10). Jude described the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah as suffering eternal fire as a retributive punishment (v. 7). These texts do not speak of endless burning, for neither Sodom nor Gomorrah nor Edom are still burning today. However, the effects of the fire that destroyed them last forever. Likewise, the "eternal fire" in Revelation does not refer to endless burning and suffering but rather to total annihilation. The prophesied fire is to burn until there is nothing left to burn.

The grotesque language used in the third angel's message is intended to move God's people to stand firm in the face of Satan's end-time deception. As the beast of Revelation 13 uses fear to compel the people in the world to choose false religion and receive the mark of the beast, so Revelation uses strong language to describe the ultimate fate of the wicked so that they can find peace and security in loyalty to the Lamb, thus revealing their fear of the Lord (see Matt. 10:28; Rev. 14:7).

14:12–13. The End-Time Saints. The three angels' messages conclude with a positive statement regarding the patient endurance of God's people. The word "this" or "here" in v. 12 shows that their endurance is primarily due to their faithful preaching of the end-time gospel, which counters Satan's deceptive activities. The saints mentioned here are the same ones prophetically spoken of in Revelation 12:17 as the object of Satan's furious rage and attack. They are characterized by their obedience to God in keeping His commandments and their unswerving faithfulness to Christ.

The saints are promised that if they suffer physical hardship and persecution, even to the point of death (Rev. 12:11), they will rest from their labors and their deeds will follow them (14:13). This promise stands in contrast to the proclamation that those who choose to worship the beast and receive its mark will never have rest (14:11). The eternal destiny of God's people is secure with Christ.

The Two Harvests

This section describes the great separation between those who have a relationship with God and those who choose to follow the beast, portrayed in terms of two harvests. Another set of three angels appeared to John in vision, coming from the temple in heaven to gather the grain into the storehouses (14:14–16) and the grapes into the winepress (14:17–20).

14:14–16. The Grain Harvest. The preaching of the gospel had been brought to an end, the destiny of every person decided, and Christ was about to bring judgment on the earth. John saw a white cloud, and on it was Jesus (14:14; cf. Dan. 7:13–14; Matt. 24:30; 26:64; Rev. 1:7). He was wearing the crown of victory (Gr. stephanos) and held in His hand a sharp sickle for reaping the harvest (see Mark 4:29).

John saw another angel come from the temple, the presence of God, and tell Jesus that the harvest could begin because the earth was ripe (v. 15). This mirrors Joel's prophecy of judgment against the nations (3:13). In response, Christ swung the sickle on the earth and reaped the harvest, symbolically portraying a great gathering of God's people at the end of this earth's history. Jesus explained that the reapers are angels (Matt. 13:39) and that before He comes, He will send His angels to gather His elect ones from all parts of the earth and to store them in His barn (Matt. 13:30-31). These gathered saints are the 144,000, the firstfruits of the harvest (Rev. 14:4). In Revelation 15:2-4, they are pictured in the presence of God and are securely protected from the harmful effects of the seven last plagues. At this point, the redeemed are about to experience the transformation of their mortal bodies (1 Cor. 15:51-54) and be joined by the resurrected saints. They will all be taken up to meet Jesus, who is coming in power and glory (1 Thess. 4:17).

14:17-20. The Grape Harvest. The wheat harvest was followed by the grape harvest. Another angel came out of the temple in heaven with a sharp sickle. Then an angel who had authority over fire came from the altar. This angel could be the one who ministered the incense with the prayers of God's people on the gold altar of incense before God and who, in concluding the service, hurled the fire on the earth as a symbol of God's judgment on rebellious humanity (Rev. 8:3-5). Here he signaled to the angel with the sickle to swing the sickle and gather the clusters, for the grapes were fully ripe.

The angel swung the sickle and gathered the grapes into the great winepress of God's anger to be crushed (14:19). The grapes were trodden underfoot outside the city, the new Jerusalem, into which nothing unclean would enter (21:27). Blood flowed from the winepress, rising up to the horses' bridles in extent of 1,600 stadia (180 mi. or 290 km), the approximate size of the Holy Land. However, since the number consists of four times four hundred, and four being the number of the earth (Is. 11:12; Rev. 7:1; 20:8), this hyperbolic distance points to the severity and worldwide scope of the execution of God's wrath. The entire world would look like a battlefield as a result of the harmful effects of the seven last plagues (19:17-21). The trampling of the grapes is described in the following section in terms of the outpouring of the seven last plagues (chaps. 15-16). Again, the picturesque language is used to warn the readers of Revelation of the seriousness of the decision they will make. Fear is expelled by a greater fear based on love. The only way to escape the destiny of the worshipers of the beast is to choose to worship and serve the true God.

15:1—18:24

THE SEVEN LAST PLAGUES

Revelation 15 begins a new vision that builds on the previous scene (14:14-20). It first describes the victorious saints gathered before the throne of God (15:1-4) and then the trampling of the rebellious in the winepress of God's anger that is portrayed in terms of the seven last plagues (15:5—19:21).

15:1-8

Introductory Vision

Revelation 15 is the introductory chapter to the whole vision; it provides vital information regarding the meaning and timing of the seven last plagues.

15:1. The Fullness of God's Wrath. The scene introduces seven angels who hold the bowls filled with the seven last plagues that were to be poured out on rebellious humanity. The plagues are identified as "last" because they are preceded by the plagues of the seven trumpets. The trumpets were preliminary judgments, anticipating the more severe judgmental plagues that were yet to come. Although punitive in purpose, they were diluted with mercy. These judgments are executed while the gospel is preached; their purpose is to awaken rebellious humanity, which is under divine judgment, and to move individuals to repentance.

However, the seven last plagues are presented as the reification of the wrath of God in its fullness on the worshipers of the beast, unmixed with or undiluted by mercy (see Rev. 14:10). In the Bible, divine wrath is defined as God's reaction to the choices people make (Rom. 1:26-28). Up to this point in earth's history, God's wrath had always been mixed with mercy. However, the time had come for all spurners of God's grace to experience the fullness of His divine wrath.

15:2-4. The Victorious Saints. Before the plagues were poured out by the angels, there was an interlude in the throne room that depicted those who choose not to worship the beast and receive its mark as standing on an expanse resembling a sea of glass. John saw them with harps in their hands and singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb (v. 3). This group of the redeemed is the same one he saw in Revelation 7:9 and 14:1-5. While in Revelation 14 their faithfulness to God is depicted in contrast to those who have sided with the satanic trinity, here they are protected by God, in contrast to the worshipers of the beast, who will experience the harmful effects of the seven last plagues. As the upcoming plagues are portrayed in terms of the plagues that struck the Egyptians just before the Exodus, the victorious saints here are proportionally pictured as if they are the Israelites on the other side of the Red Sea, celebrating the great victory and praising God for their miraculous deliverance (Ex. 15).

15:5-8. The Conclusion of Intercession. At this point, John saw as the temple or tabernacle in heaven was opened. Both "temple" and "tabernacle" are used here to allude to the Jerusalem temple as well as the sanctuary built by Moses. John saw in vision the heavenly temple or sanctuary, after which the earthly sanctuaries were modeled (see Ex. 25:9). The term "testimony" or "covenant law" (Rev. 15:5) refers to the stone tablets inscribed with the Ten Commandments, located inside the ark of the covenant (1 Kin. 8:9). This shows that the holy of holies of the heavenly temple is in view here. The angels came out of the temple with the seven plagues (vv. 5-6), coming from the very presence of God. Each angel was given a golden bowl filled with the wrath of God (v. 7; cf. v. 1). These are most likely the temple bowls filled with incense, which represents the prayers of God's people (see Rev. 5:8). Here, those same bowls were to serve as instruments for the execution of God's wrath on the enemies of His people. God was answering the prayers of His people.

At this point, the temple was filled with smoke from God's glory and power, resulting in no one being able to enter the temple (v. 8). This language is derived from the dedication of both the tabernacle in the wilderness (Ex. 40:34-35) and Solomon's temple (1 Kin. 8:10-11). On both occasions, the cloud of God's glory filled the building so that the priests could not enter to minister before Him. With the absence of the priests, there was no intercession in the temple. Revelation 15:8 shows that before the pouring out of the seven plagues on the world, Christ's intercessory ministry in heaven will be concluded, and at this point probation closes. With the preaching of the gospel being finished (14:6-20), the door of opportunity will ultimately close and the destiny of every person will have been decided.

This scene shows that the seven last plagues are not intended to bring anyone to repentance, as the opportunity for repentance has passed. They are rather intended to reveal the hardness of the hearts of the wicked. Just as each of the Egyptian plagues increased the hardness of the hearts of Pharaoh and his officials, so each last plague hardens the hearts of the worshipers of the satanic trinity.

The Seven Last Plagues

With the conclusion of Christ's mediatory ministry, the seven angels were ordered to pour out the bowls of the wrath of God on the earth. The judgments of these seven last plagues were to be poured out exclusively on those who chose to side with the satanic trinity and receive the mark of the beast. While the first five plagues seem to be literal (see Rev. 7:16), the last two are clearly symbolic and spiritual. The sixth plague brings us to the very threshold of the great battle of Armageddon, set in the closing period of this earth's history. The seventh plague concludes the scenario with the demise of end-time Babylon.

16:2-11. The First Five Plagues. The first angel poured his bowl on the earth, inflicting severely painful sores exclusively on those who had the mark of the beast and worshiped the image of the beast (see Rev. 14:9-10). This disease is described as causing painful and incurable boils that cover the entire body (cf. Deut. 28:35; Job 2:7). A plague of this kind struck the Egyptians during the Exodus (Ex. 9:9-11). God's sealed people were not to be affected by this plague.

The second and third angels poured out their bowls on bodies of water: the sea and the rivers and springs, respectively. These plagues echo the first plague of Egypt (Ex. 7:20-21) by turning the water to blood and killing the creatures within. Without food from the seas and clean water to drink from the rivers and springs, rebellious humanity will not survive. These plagues were to come on followers of the beast because they shed the blood of God's prophets and His people—they were given blood to drink in retribution (v. 6). The punishment fits the crime. In response, a voice came from the altar and declared the righteous nature of God's judgments (v. 7). This altar is the one spoken of in the fifth seal underneath which God's people were praying to God to vindicate them and judge those dwelling on the earth (see Rev. 6:9–10). Here, there comes an affirmation from the altar that their prayers were finally answered through these plagues. Justice will have been done.

The fourth angel poured out his bowl on the sun, resulting in an intense heat that scorched people and caused them unbearable pain (vv. 8–9). This unbearable pain, however, did not move the wicked to repent. They had hardened their hearts to such an extent that they could not return. Instead, they cursed and blasphemed the name of God, who executed these plagues. Nothing was able to change the course of their actions.

The fifth angel poured out his bowl on the throne of the beast, bringing total darkness over his kingdom (v. 10). This scene mirrors the ninth plague of Egypt, which struck the whole land with total and intense darkness (Ex. 10:21–23). Satan delegated the throne and authority to the beast (Rev. 13:2), but at this moment, the very seat of Satan's authority could not withstand the force of these plagues. The authority of the beast was thus undermined. As the people gnawed their tongues in pain, they became more enraged. They began to realize the impotence and inability of the unholy trinity to protect them from the effects of the plagues. They felt deceived. However, as in the case of the pharaoh during the Exodus, the terror and pain of the plagues further confirmed the hardness of their hearts. They continued to curse and blaspheme God for their pain and sores and refused to repent (v. 11).

16:12. The Sixth Plague. While the first five plagues seem to be literal (see Rev. 7:16), the sixth and seventh plagues are clearly symbolic and spiritual in nature. The sixth angel poured out his bowl on the great river Euphrates (see 9:14), resulting in its waters drying up (v. 12). This whole scene echoes the fall of ancient Babylon to illustrate the fall of end-time Babylon (see below, "Babylon and the Great River Euphrates").

What will cause such a sudden change in attitude toward Babylon? As the people in the world experience the upheavals in nature, they will turn to Babylon for protection. However, as the fifth plague strikes the very seat of the beast's authority (16:10), the disillusioned people will realize the extent of Babylon's inability to protect them from the effects of the plagues. Feeling deceived and filled with hostility, they will unite in turning against Babylon and will destroy it.

The reason for the collapse of end-time Babylon is to prepare the way for the kings from the east. This is an allusion to Cyrus and his armies, who overthrew ancient Babylon as the oppressor of God's people. Isaiah referred to Cyrus as God's anointed (Is. 45:1), who would come from sunrise, that is, the east (Is. 41:25). His conquest of Babylon provided for the deliverance of God's people from captivity and their return to their homeland (Is. 44:28; Jer. 50:33–38). Just as the drying up of the waters of the Euphrates prepared the way for Cyrus and his forces to conquer ancient Babylon, so the symbolic drying up of the Euphrates in the end times will prepare the way for the coming of the kings from the east to defeat the end-time enemies of God and His people.

Babylon and the Great River Euphrates

In the OT, the Euphrates was the boundary that separated Israel from their enemies, such as Assyria and Babylon (Is. 7:20; Jer. 46:10). These enemy nations came against God's people from this great river (Is. 8:7–8). The Euphrates River flowed through the city of Babylon, nourished crops, and provided water for the people. Without the river, Babylon could not have existed.

In Revelation 17:1, Babylon is pictured as a prostitute who dwells on many waters, which may be a reference to the Euphrates (Jer. 51:13). The waters on which end-time Babylon will dwell represent the worldwide civil, secular, and political powers that give their support to Babylon (see Rev. 17:15). At a certain point in time, however, these symbolic waters will dry up.

The scene in which the Euphrates is dried up reflects when ancient Babylon was captured by Cyrus in 539 B.C. Additionally, the fall of ancient Babylon is associated with the drying up of the waters of the Euphrates in the OT (Is. 44:27–28; Jer. 51:36–37). Ancient historians tell us that the Persians diverted the Euphrates and entered the city through the dried riverbed, thereby taking the city by surprise. In a similar manner, the collapse of end-time Babylon, the enemy of God and His people, will take place when the worldwide civil, secular, and political powers withdraw their support and turn against the great city (Rev. 17:15–17).

The kings from the east referred to in Revelation 16 are Christ and His army of saints, who will fight in the final battle (see 17:14). In Revelation 19:14–16, at Jesus's return, the armies of heaven will be wearing "fine linen, white and clean" (19:14) as He leads them into battle. This linen represents the righteous acts of God's people (19:7–8). Elsewhere in Revelation, God's people are called royal priests (1:6; 5:10) and are pictured as an army of 144,000 warriors under the leadership of Jesus Christ as they fight against evil forces (14:1). The final battle of this earth's history involves Christ and His faithful people on one side and the coalition of the satanic trinity and their followers on the other.

16:13–14. Three Frog-like Demons. These verses explain how the nations of the earth gathered together to fight against God's people. The three angels gathered the remnant while three demonic spirits gathered the wicked. John saw three unclean spirits that looked like frogs coming out of the mouth of the unholy trinity, purposing to go to and assemble the leaders of the world for the battle of the "great day of God Almighty" (v. 14). This scene recalls the deceiving spirit that enticed King Ahab to refuse the message sent to him from God to go into battle (1 Kin. 22:21–23). The demonic spirits are the mouthpieces of the unholy trinity in the last deception. They are portrayed as the counterpart to the three angels of Revelation 14. The frog plague was the last of Moses's plagues that the Egyptian magicians were able to duplicate, by which they influenced Pharaoh to persist in his opposition to God (Ex. 8:1–15). The three frog-like demons are thus Satan's last attempt to counterfeit the work of God (Rev. 13:13–14). The satanic trinity will send them out with a false gospel to persuade the secular and political powers of the world to side with them against God and His people in preparation for the great day of God Almighty.

These frog-like demonic spirits are thus also Satan's powerful agents. Satan will enable them to perform miraculous signs as a means of persuasion. The activities of the demonic trinity will result in great success, as the kings of the world, meaning those with power, will be deceived. The stage will now be set for the final confrontation.

16:15. The Laodicean Warning. John briefly interrupted the scene with an exhortation from Jesus to His people: Christ is coming like a thief, and they are to keep alert and properly clothed lest they be found naked and exposed (v. 15). This exhortation echoes an ancient practice in the Jerusalem temple, where the temple captain would go by night to check the guards of the temple gates. If any guard were caught asleep at his post, his clothes were stripped off and burned and he was sent away in disgrace, naked. By alluding to this temple practice, Christ urged His followers to be spiritually alert. They must be like the temple guards, always dressed and on alert (Mark 13:35–37).

Jesus's admonition reiterated His earlier appeal to the church of Laodicea to clothe themselves with white garments, so that the shame of their nakedness would not be exposed (Rev. 3:18). White garments in Revelation symbolize uncompromising loyalty and faithfulness to Christ (3:4–5). In defeating Babylon, God would leave her abandoned and naked (17:16) as a small part of the severe humiliation experienced by a defeated army (Is. 20:4). Those who compromise with Babylon will have a share in her humiliating shamefulness. Only those clothed with the robe of Christ's righteousness will be able to stand firm in the final crisis.

16:16. Gathering for the Battle of Armageddon. The deceptive demonic miracles will achieve success beyond any prediction or expectation. John foresaw the world powers gathered together to the place called Armageddon in Hebrew (v. 16). The name has been interpreted in different ways, but it likely means "the mountain of Megiddo." In the OT, Megiddo was a fortress-city located in the Valley of Jezreel (or the Plain of Esdraelon) at the foot of the Carmel ridge between the Mediterranean Sea and the Sea of Galilee. The city was an important strategic site, as it stood on the great highway from Egypt to Damascus, thus providing a natural passage for the invasion of the Holy Land. The Valley of Jezreel was known for many famous battles in ancient times. In the OT, the city of Megiddo witnessed many decisive battles in the history of Israel (Judg. 5:19–21; 6:33; 2 Kin. 9:27; 23:29–30). Revelation seems to be using this motif from Israel's history to depict the final great conflict between God and the forces of evil. The religious and secular powers are portrayed as a unified army under the leadership of the satanic trinity for the final battle. In Revelation 9, their number is two hundred million, in contrast to the 144,000 of the saints.

The mount of Megiddo was Mount Carmel, situated close to the city. Mount Carmel was the site of one of the most significant battles in Israel's history, which involved the prophet Elijah and the prophets of Baal (1 Kin. 18:16–46), whose conflict centered on the identity of the true God (1 Kin. 18:21). The fire that came down from heaven demonstrated that the Lord is the only true God—the only One worthy of worship (1 Kin. 18:38–39). This connection identifies Armageddon as not a military battle to be fought somewhere in the Middle East but rather a spiritual battle between Christ and His followers and the forces of darkness (2 Cor. 10:4; Eph. 6:12). The issue to be resolved once and for all in the final battle is the same one Satan introduced at the beginning of the Great Controversy regarding the identity of the legitimate ruler of the universe. The outcome of the final battle will mirror that of the confrontation on Carmel: God's ultimate triumph over the forces of darkness.

Revelation 16:12–16 does not portray the actual battle, but only the great gathering of the religious and political powers to Armageddon. The actual battle follows the sixth plague and is described in Revelation 16:17—19:21. It will conclude with the total collapse and defeat of the satanic triumvirate and its armies.

16:17–21. The Seventh Plague. The seventh angel poured out his bowl on the air. A loud voice issued from the temple, God's throne, announcing, "It is done" (v. 17). That this announcement came from the throne of God suggests that God Himself was speaking in the same voice that commissioned the seven angels to pour out their bowls (16:1). In the NT, the pronouncement "It is done" is made three times. The first was on the cross of Calvary in an announcement of Christ's victory over Satan (John 19:30). The third and last time it is made, it will proclaim the final eradication of sin and the beginning of God's everlasting kingdom on earth (Rev. 21:6). Here, in Revelation 16:17, it proclaims God's victory over Satan and the powers of evil.

This pronouncement was followed by lightning flashes, rumbling noises, and thunderclaps (v. 18). In Revelation, these phenomena are always associated with the throne that represents the presence of God (Rev. 4:5; cf. 8:5; 11:19). A terrible earthquake then occurred, the severity of which was unlike any earthquake before in history, shattering Babylon and splitting it into three parts. End-time Babylon is comprised of the union of the satanic trinity (the dragon, the sea beast, and the earth beast) in its alliance with the religious powers of the world (see 14:8). This unity of the satanic trinity will be shattered in the earthquake.

This shattering of end-time Babylon will lead to the unavoidable collapse of the cities of the nations. The reference to nations here points to the civil and political powers of the world that will support end-time Babylon. The fragmentation of Babylon will take place when the nations of the earth withdraw their support from her. It is this event that the drying up of the river Euphrates symbolically represents (16:12).

John notes that Babylon the great was "remembered" by God and that He caused her to drink from the cup of the wine of His wrath (v. 19). In Revelation 18:5–6, God remembers Babylon's iniquities and punishes her with a double, mixed portion from her own cup. Babylon, who caused all nations to drink her wine of sexual immorality and anger (14:8; cf. 17:2; 18:3), will be given the cup of the wine of God's wrath, along with all those who choose to side with her.

The earthquake of the seventh plague will submerge every island and will cast the mountains into the sea (v. 20). In the scene of the sixth seal, the earthquake moved mountains and islands from their places (6:12, 14). Following the earthquake, large hailstones, each about a talent (ca. 100 lb. or 45 kg) in weight, will fall from the sky on the people (16:21). In the OT, hailstones were used as a means of judgment against the enemies of Israel (e.g., Ex. 9:13–35; Josh. 10:11; Ezek. 38:22). In the same way, hailstones will be used as weapons of judgment against the enemies of God's end-time people.

As with the other plagues (Rev. 16:9, 11, 21), these hailstones will not produce any change in the wicked, who will respond by cursing God and refusing to repent of their evil deeds. These exceedingly great plagues will not bring anyone to repentance but will reveal what is in their rebellious hearts.

17:1–18

The Woman and the Beast

Revelation 14:8 announced the fall of end-time Babylon and Revelation 16:19 pronounced its actual collapse. Chapters 17–18 detail how this will actually happen. Before describing the demise of end-time Babylon in chapter 18, John in chapter 17 describes the end-time apostate religious system and gives the reasons for its fall (vv. 1–11). The rest of the chapter gives further information on the sixth and seventh plagues regarding the drying up of the Euphrates River (see 16:12).

17:1–2. The Prostitute Sitting on Waters. One of the angels with the seven bowls invited John to witness the judgment of the great prostitute or harlot, who is later identified as Babylon the great (v. 5). A woman in the Bible is a symbol of God's people (see 12:1). In Revelation, God's faithful people are portrayed as a chaste woman (19:7–8; 22:17). A harlot therefore represents the apostate and unfaithful.

In describing this end-time apostate religious system, the book of Revelation combines the symbols of the women and the city (see 17:18). The angel stated that the harlot sits on many waters, which is a reference to the Euphrates River, on which ancient Babylon dwelled (Jer. 51:13). The angel later explained that these waters symbolize the civil, secular, and political powers of the world (Rev. 17:15). Just as ancient Babylon depended on the Euphrates River for its existence, so end-time Babylon will ally itself with the world leaders in order to support its plans and purposes.

Two groups are mentioned specifically, the first of which are "the kings of the earth" (v. 2), referring to the governing political powers of the world. They are portrayed as having committed sexual immorality with the harlot. In the OT, the language of fornication is frequently used to describe how Israel aligned itself with pagan nations (Is. 1:21; Jer. 3:1–10; Ezek. 16, 23). The adulterous relationship of the kings of the earth with the harlot symbolizes an illicit union between the end-time religious confederacy and the governing world powers that will occur in the final crisis.

The second group mentioned is "the inhabitants of the earth," referring to the general populace rather than the world's leaders, who were made spiritually drunk with the wine of her immorality (see 14:8). While the world's leaders committed adultery with the prostitute Babylon, the rest of the people were intoxicated by Babylon's deceptive teachings and activities, aimed at enticing them to worship the beast (14:8; 18:3). When people are drunk, they cannot think soberly, and when the effects of the drunkenness have worn off, they realize the bad decisions and actions they made while impaired. Both groups in the vision were equally deceived and came under the control of Babylon for political and economic reasons. The time will come, however, when these people realize the bad choices they have made and turn against Babylon. This realization will come too late.

17:3–6a. The Prostitute Sitting on the Beast. John was next carried in vision into the wilderness (cf. 12:14–17), where he saw a woman sitting on a scarlet beast, not on the waters as he had previously been told. While the prostitute represents a religious entity, the beast symbolizes political power. The beast was filled with blasphemous names and had seven heads and ten horns (see 13:1). The prophecy tells us that at the time of the end, there will be a worldwide union between religious and political powers. The prostitute was seen riding on the sea beast, a picture that signifies that this religious system has the support of the political powers as well as control over them.

The woman is pictured in extravagant attire, wearing purple and scarlet and lavishly adorned with ornaments of gold, precious stones, and pearls (v. 4). In ancient times, prostitutes wore scarlet clothing and lavish ornaments for the purpose of seduction (Jer. 4:30). The scarlet color of the woman's dress corresponds to the scarlet color of the beast on which she sits. Furthermore, as the color of blood and oppression, scarlet or red appropriately corresponds to the coercive character of this religious system (see Rev. 17:6). In addition, purple is used for royal attire (Esth. 8:15; Dan. 5:7) and therefore fits the harlot's claim to be a queen (Rev. 18:7).

The prostitute's dress was for the purpose of seduction, but it is also reminiscent of the attire of the high priest in the OT, which included purple, scarlet, and gold (Ex. 28:5–6). The inscription on her forehead resembles the one of sanctity to the Lord that resided on the miter of the high priest (Ex. 28:36–38). Furthermore, the cup in her hand reflects the drink offering given in the sanctuary (Ex. 30:9; Lev. 23:13). With its historic religious appearance, this end-time religious system will become Satan's powerful tool in seducing the world away from God and into apostasy.

However, although she appeared in religious garb, this woman was a prostitute or harlot. She had an inscription on her forehead, reflecting the look of a prostitute in the OT (Jer. 3:3), which referred to her as the mother of prostitutes and abominations (v. 5). While in Revelation Babylon stands for the end-time coalition of dragon, beast, and false prophet. Babylon's daughters stand for apostate and rebellious religious powers that were to unite with the satanic trinity to form an end-time religious confederacy.

The prostitute Babylon is further described as being "drunk with the blood" of God's holy people who died due to their witness for Christ (v. 6; cf. 6:9; 13:7). This clearly links end-time Babylon to the little horn of Daniel 7 and the sea beast of Revelation 13, which represent medieval apostate Christianity in Western Europe. This institution was responsible for the deaths of millions of Christians.

17:6b–8. The Healed Beast. John was filled with great amazement when he saw the woman. He obviously recognized in her the woman who had fled into the wilderness in order to escape the persecution of the dragon during the prophetic 1,260-day period of the Middle Ages (Rev. 12:13–14). This shows that this end-time opponent of God's people was once part of Christ's faithful church. The main bulk of the church that was faithful to God in the past will turn into an enemy of God's faithful remnant at the time of the end (12:17). In response to John's amazement, the angel who had invited him to witness Babylon's judgment (see v. 1) began to disclose the mystery of the woman and the beast that carried her (v. 7). These two are inseparable, for the harlot derived her character and power from the beast. As the medieval church used political power to control the beliefs of people, so Babylon will use the world-governing political powers to impose its seductive teachings and practices at the time of the end.

The scarlet beast is identified as the one that used to be ("was"), currently "is not," and "will" in the future ascend from the abyss or bottomless pit and go to its destruction (v. 8). This phrase is, first of all, a parody of the divine name, Yahweh—the One who was, who is, and who is to come in Revelation 4:8 (also 1:4, 8). On the other hand, it shows that the sea beast had passed through three phases of existence: (1) The beast "was," indicating that it existed in the past. There are clear links between this scarlet beast and the sea beast of Revelation 13—both are pictured as being full of blasphemous names and as having seven heads and ten horns. The "was" phase of the scarlet beast refers to its activities during the period of the prophetic 1,260 days (cf. 13:5). (2) With its deadly wound (see 13:3), the beast came into the "is not" phase. It disappeared for some time, yet it survived. (3) Finally, with the healing of the deadly wound (see 13:12), the beast will come to life once again, full of satanic rage against God's faithful people.

Revelation 17 thus describes the sea beast of Revelation 13:1–8 at the time when its deadly wound had been healed (see 13:12). It is on this resurrected sea beast that the end-time prostitute Babylon sits. Revelation thus tells us that religion will once again dominate and control politics as it did during the Middle Ages, albeit for a short period of time. The resurrection of the beast will prompt the admiration of the inhabitants of the earth, referring to all those whose names have not been written in the Book of Life from the beginning of the world (17:8). This reiterates Revelation 13:8, which links the scarlet beast that will carry the harlot Babylon with the sea beast that is the medieval religious system.

17:9–11. The Seven Heads of the Beast. The angel then proceeded to explain the meaning of the beast's seven heads. The prerequisite to understanding their meaning is wisdom (v. 9; see also 13:18). This wisdom refers to spiritual discernment imparted by the Spirit alone (James 1:5). Only through this divinely imparted wisdom will God's end-time people be able to discern the true character of this end-time satanic system.

The beast had seven heads like the dragon that represents Satan in Revelation 12:3. The beast existed and functioned through the agency of its heads; when one received a deadly blow, the whole beast died. The seven heads are mountains on which the woman sits (17:9). The Greek word orē means "mountains," though some translators have rendered it "hills," possibly to reference the city of Rome, which was known as the city on seven hills. However, neither literal hills nor mountains are in view here, for the obvious reason that these mountains are successive, not synchronic. Mountains in the Bible are often used as a symbol for kingdoms or empires (Jer. 51:25; Ezek. 35:2–5; Dan. 2:35).

The angel immediately explained that while these seven mountains symbolize seven kings, they are not individual kings, for Revelation does not deal with individual personalities but with systems. In the Bible, the word "kings" refers to kingdoms or empires (Dan. 2:37–39; 7:17). The seven mountains on which the prostitute Babylon sat thus stand for seven successive empires that have dominated the world throughout history and through which Satan has worked to oppose God. These empires have shared the common traits of religious-political governance and coercion, which have been used to persecute and destroy God's people.

The angel further explained that five of these kingdoms had fallen, one was present, and the other had not yet come (v. 10). The identity of these seven kingdoms has occasioned a diverse variation of suggestions. In interpreting these kingdoms, we must remember that Revelation does not deal with individual personalities but rather with systems and world powers, whether political or religious. We must also keep in mind that the angel explained the meaning of these kingdoms to John in the context of his time, rather than from the end-time perspective. The kingdom the angel specified as "is" was thus the Roman Empire of John's time. The five that had fallen would be the empires that ruled the world prior to John's time: Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, and Greece. The seventh kingdom that "has not yet come" refers to the medieval papacy that, from John's perspective, was to be manifested in the future after the fall of the Roman Empire.

The angel further identified the scarlet beast itself as being the eighth head (v. 11), yet belonging still to the seven. It is most likely the seventh head that was to experience the deadly wound and come back to life once that wound was healed. We therefore now live in the era of the seventh head, for the eighth head has not yet gained power. It will appear on the worldwide scene at the time of the end for a limited time, and then it will go to its destruction.

17:12–13. The Ten Horns of the Beast. The angel explained that the ten horns of the beast represent ten kings that were to dominate with the beast during the time of the eighth head. The book doesn't explain exactly who these end-time powers are; only the future will reveal their full identity. All we can derive from the text is that the ten kings, meaning the kingdoms, are a short-lived end-time confederacy of the world's nations. Their number denotes the totality of the nations of the world who will put themselves under the control of the satanic trinity (see 17:2). They will render allegiance to the beast, something that will last only for a short time—"one hour" in prophetic terms (v. 12). The beast will use them to enforce its plans and purposes.

17:14–18. The Battle of Armageddon. At this point, the book briefly recounts the battle of Armageddon, which was introduced in Revelation 16:12–16 and described in more detail in 19:11–21. Induced by Babylon, the worldwide political confederacy will wage war against the Lamb. This shows that the final battle is not a military battle in the Middle East between Jews and various Muslim nations but between Satan and his confederacy and Christ and His faithful people, who are referred to as "called," "chosen," and "faithful" (v. 14). Babylon's aim is to defeat Christ and destroy God's people. However, the Lamb will defeat them. The battle will conclude with the triumph of Christ and the ultimate destruction of the worldwide confederacy that loyally supported Babylon (see 19:11–21).

The whole scenario suddenly changes in the final stage of the battle. The following scene correlates with the drying up of the Euphrates River in the sixth plague (16:12): the ten horns suddenly turn against Babylon, resulting in a gruesome scene (17:16). John here employed OT language of judgments against adulterous Jerusalem (Jer. 4:30; Ezek. 16:35–41; 23:22–29) in describing how the ten horns treated the prostitute Babylon. The savage act of eating someone's flesh is a token of extreme hostility and hatred (Rev. 17:16; see also Ps. 27:2; Mic. 3:3), and according to the Mosaic law, burning by fire was to be the punishment for a priest's daughter who was involved in prostitution (Lev. 21:9). This is a further indication that the harlot Babylon denotes a religious system that was once true to God but will, at the time of the end, turn away from Him. As chapter 16 indicates, the world's political powers would become disillusioned by the inability of Babylon to protect them from the plagues (vv. 10–11). Feeling deceived and filled with antagonism and hostility, they will attack her and bring her to ruin.

The scene concludes with a reminder that God is in control and that the wicked may go no further than God allows them (v. 17). In fact, the actions of the deceived governing powers will carry out God's judgment on Babylon. The angel reminded John that the great prostitute who had seduced the people of the world is the city that reigns over the kings of the earth (v. 18). The great harlot who sat on the beast and the great city Babylon that was on the Euphrates are the same entity. These two symbolize the same end-time apostate religious system that will stand in opposition to God. Divine judgment against this religious system is described in the following chapter in terms of the destruction of the historical city of Babylon, which became wealthy through economic trade.

Judgment on Babylon

Revelation 18 continues the tale of Babylon's demise. While in chapter 17 the judgment on this end-time apostate religious system is pictured in terms of the execution of a prostitute, it is portrayed in chapter 18 in terms of a wealthy commercial city sinking into the sea. In describing it, John employed language of the fall of ancient Babylon used by Isaiah and Jeremiah.

18:1–3. The Fall of Babylon Announced. The chapter begins with another angel coming down from heaven with great authority, whose radiance illuminates the whole earth (v. 1). The angel proclaimed with a loud voice that Babylon the Great had fallen (see 14:8). This is the language used by Isaiah concerning ancient Babylon (21:9), signifying that the fall of end-time Babylon is as certain as the collapse of the ancient city. The repetitive use of the word "fallen" (Rev. 18:2) further points to the certainty of the fall of Babylon. The glorious appearance of the angel and his loud voice were intended to ensure that all earth dwellers heard God's call to leave this apostate religious system and turn to Him before it was too late. Like Babylon of old, this end-time religious system had become a dwelling place of demons, unclean spirits, and unclean birds (Is. 13:19–22; Jer. 50:39).

Babylon will be judged and charged on religious, political, and economic grounds (Rev. 18:3). First, it will be charged with intoxicating the inhabitants of the earth with its corruptive teachings and doctrines (see 14:8; 17:2). Second, this apostate religious system will be charged with seducing the governing political powers of the world into an adulterous relationship for political and economic gain. Third, it will be charged with making the merchants of the earth rich through its own extravagant wealth and luxury (17:2; 18:3). This reveals the economic motive behind the end-time religious and political union, which was hinted at in 13:16–17.

18:4–8. Call to Separate from Babylon. Before the judgment of Babylon, a voice from heaven addressed God's people in the city. There will be many sincere, God-fearing people who are in Babylon. Just as Lot was exhorted to break off all ties with Sodom in order to escape the fate of the city's inhabitants, so God sends His final appeal to His people to cut all ties with this apostate religious system and come out of it, to escape both the sins and the plagues that will come on it (v. 4). This call echoes the appeal of Jeremiah to the Jews in ancient Babylon (Jer. 51:45). God does not want anyone in Babylon to perish, and this is the last opportunity for people to turn to God and escape the system's fate. Those who choose to stay in Babylon will consequently share in its fate. Revelation 19:1–10 shows that there are many in Babylon who will respond to the call.

The innumerable sins of the apostate religious system will have accumulated to the point that they reach heaven (v. 5), just like the crimes of ancient Babylon before it was destroyed (Jer. 51:9). God will not forget Babylon's unrighteous acts (see Rev. 16:19); He will bring retribution on this apostate religious system for what it has done to God's people, just as he repaid ancient Babylon for the evil it did to ancient Israel (Jer. 50:29; 51:24). This arrogant apostate system exhibits boastful self-glorification, claiming to be queen and that she will never be widowed or sorrowful (v. 7). This arrogant boasting mirrors the similar boastful self-glorification of ancient Babylon (Is. 47:7–8). In glorifying itself, Babylon was assuming the prerogatives of God. Babylon will be judged according to its sins, with this arrogant self-glorification as the basis for its condemnation and punishment. The judgment will demonstrate that the Lord God is strong and mighty (v. 8) and that He has the power to bring this apostate religious system to its end.

18:9–19. Laments over Babylon. Babylon's fall brought great sorrow to those who cooperated with the system for personal benefit and gain. The rest of the chapter describes three mournful laments of those who suffered personal loss as a result of Babylon's collapse, which are expressed in the form of ancient funeral dirges. Each begins with ouai ouai ("woe, woe," "alas, alas") and ends with emphasis on the suddenness of Babylon's fall, acknowledging how all of the devastating events took place "in one hour" (18:10, 16–17, 19).

The first who are portrayed lamenting over the collapse of Babylon are the kings of the earth who committed sexual immorality and lived in luxury with her (18:9–17a). These are the governing powers of the world spoken of in 17:2. This end-time religious system acted through them to gain control over the people and enforce its corrupt teachings and policies. Babylon promised them safety and security. These powers will finally recognize that they were deceived, and in their rage, they will turn against Babylon and carry out its destruction (17:16). However, they will realize that Babylon's destruction means their own loss of power and wealth.

The second group of mourners is comprised of the merchants of the earth who profited from their commercial interactions with this end-time apostate religious system (18:11–17a). These prominent people (see v. 23) grew prosperous and rich by selling and distributing Babylon's corrupt goods. The catalog of the luxurious and costly merchandise provided in vv. 12–13 are similar to those mentioned in the dirge over Tyre (Ezek. 27:5–24).

The third group is comprised of sea merchants and sailors who transported Babylon's goods for the aforementioned merchants (18:17b–19). Both had acquired wealth by cooperating with Babylon. Their lament mirrors the lament over the fall of Tyre in Ezekiel 27:29–32. Here, the two groups mourn while standing at a distance as they watch the city burn. The collapse of Babylon means that they will no longer profit from its wealth. In its fate they will see their own destiny.

18:20. Rejoicing over Babylon's Destruction. On the other hand, just as the fall of ancient Babylon was good news for Israel (Jer. 51:48–49), so the fall of end-time Babylon will be good news for God's end-time people. To both peoples, the destruction of Babylon means deliverance from oppression. They can rejoice with heaven and all holy apostles and prophets because of God's vengeance (v. 20). Babylon is responsible for inducing the governing powers of the world to attack God's people. The judgment on this end-time apostate religious system will be God's act of salvation for His oppressed and persecuted people. The call to rejoice here is answered with shouts of praise in Revelation 19:1–10.

18:21–24. The Fall of Babylon Recounted. The conclusion of the vision provides a symbolic demonstration of Babylon's overthrow. John watched as a strong angel took a boulder the size of a large millstone and hurled it into the sea, declaring that this would be the violent manner in which Babylon is thrown down so that it can never be found again (v. 21). This symbolic scene reflects the one described in Jeremiah 51:59–64; the judgment of historical Babylon becomes a type of the judgment of end-time Babylon, both of which ring with finality. There will be no more music, no everyday business or domestic activities such as craftsmanship and food production. Never again will light shine in it, nor will the sound of nuptial festivities be heard (vv. 22–23).

The purpose of Revelation 18 is to assure God's end-time people that evil will not last forever. Babylon, the apostate religious system, has severely harmed and shed the blood of many of God's faithful people—of all on earth who have been slaughtered (v. 24). Jeremiah prophesied that Babylon must fall (Jer. 51:49); the apostate system has become drunk with the blood of God's holy people (Rev. 17:6). This archenemy of God and His people will finally be overthrown. God's people are assured again that God is with them even when they suffer injustice. However, they must wait patiently, for the time is coming when evil will finally be defeated and will never rise again, and it is then that they will finally be brought to their long-awaited home.

THE DESTRUCTION OF EVIL

Revelation 19–20 describes the final triumph of God over the forces of evil. This section begins with a description of the people rejoicing over the destruction of end-time Babylon (19:1–10), followed by the conclusion of the battle of Armageddon (19:11–21). Chapter 20 describes the events of the Millennium (vv. 1–10) and the final judgment (vv. 11–15).

19:1–6
Rejoicing over the Fall of Babylon

This section describes the jubilant celebration of the victory over Babylon in response to the call given in Revelation 18:20. In describing this joyful scene, John referenced many passages from different parts of the book. The description of the entire scene echoes that of the throne room scene in Revelation 4 in particular.

John heard a great multitude in heaven exclaiming praise to God for His glory, power, and salvation (v. 1). This scene echoes the shouts of the great multitude in Revelation 7:10. These redeemed saints are depicted praising God for His righteous judgment on Babylon, who corrupted the earth through her sexual immorality (see 17:1–6). The Greek word diaphtheirō ("destroy") used in Revelation 11:18, where the time had come for the destroyers of the earth to be destroyed, is here fulfilled.

With the destruction of Babylon complete, God will have taken vengeance on the prostitute, who represents the end-time apostate religious system and had the blood of His servants on her hands (v. 2; see 18:24). The martyrs will have been avenged and vindicated (6:10), as the destruction of Babylon ultimately answers their prayers. The smoke of the overthrown city will rise up forever and ever (v. 3; see 14:11), which is another way of saying Babylon will never again rise from the ruins (cf. Is. 34:8–10). The destruction of the oppressor of God's people is certain and permanent.

John watched as the redeemed saints were joined by the twenty-four elders and the four living creatures, the latter of whom fell before the throne and worshiped God with amens and hallelujahs (v. 4). This jubilant celebration reached its climax with the exclamation of praise to the Lord God Almighty, the Omnipotent One who rules over all (v. 6). This exclamation is reminiscent of the announcement at the seventh trumpet (see Rev. 11:17). The destruction of end-time Babylon marks the beginning of God's reign over the earth in the fullness of His unending power and authority.

19:7–9

The Wedding Supper of the Lamb

The next thing John was shown is the focus of the entire book: the long-awaited union of Christ with His people. John heard the proclamation that the wedding of the Lamb had come as well as a call for rejoicing and celebration. Christ's bride, who is to be those of God's people who have chosen not to partake in Babylon's sins, had prepared herself. In ancient Jewish weddings, the prospective groom would go to the house of the bride-to-be for the betrothal. After the payment of the dowry, the groom and the bride were considered legally married, although they could not yet live together. The groom then returned to his father's house and prepared the place where he and his bride would live. Meanwhile, the bride stayed at her father's house to prepare for the wedding. When the preparations had been completed, the groom would go back to the bride's house and the wedding feast would take place. Afterward, he would take his bride to the place he had prepared.

In a similar manner, Christ left His Father's house in heaven to come down to the earth to be betrothed to His bride, the church. After paying the dowry with His life at Calvary, He returned to His Father's house to prepare a place for His bride, while His bride remained on the earth to prepare herself for the wedding. At the end of history, Christ will come back and will finally be united with His bride and take her to His Father's house (cf. John 14:2–3).

Revelation uses the metaphor of the bride to describe God's people during the interval between Christ's First and Second Comings, during which they are preparing themselves for the Groom's long-awaited return. John saw the bride dressed in fine, bright, and clean linen to wear, which represents the righteousness of God's holy people (v. 8). This does not mean that God's people are to put on their own deeds. The robes of God's people will be supplied to them by Christ (Rev. 3:18; 6:11), washed in the blood of the Lamb (7:14). That the bride had made herself ready by arraying herself in the robes granted to her by Christ points to both human responsibility and divine activity (see Phil. 2:12–13). The righteous deeds of God's people are the external reflection of the internal works of Christ in their lives.

In concluding the scene, John was urged to write down a proclamation of blessing for those invited to the Lamb's wedding (v. 9). Revelation portrays the experience of God's end-time people from two different perspectives: the bride and the invited guests at the wedding supper. While the former points to the coming union with Christ, the latter reminds believers that they have to respond to the call and prepare themselves for that great day.

We must keep in mind that Revelation 19 does not describe the actual wedding; it only announces the coming of the time for that long-awaited event. The wedding itself will take place when God's people find themselves in the new Jerusalem, which is the Lamb's bride, His wife (21:9). The new Jerusalem and God's people are equated because God's people will be permanently united to their Lord in that city.

The Spirit of Prophecy

Filled with awe regarding what he had just heard, John fell at the angel's feet to worship him. However, the angel restrained him, explaining that he was just a servant sent to serve the community of believers, which included John, who possess the "testimony of Jesus" (v. 10). He admonished John to worship God instead. This repeats the statement in Revelation 12:17, where the remnant of the woman's offspring is identified as the ones who keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus. The angel further explained to John that the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy. John would not have had difficulty understanding the meaning of this, because in his day, the expression was widely used to refer to the Holy Spirit as He spoke through the prophets. The testimony of Jesus thus refers to the special message Jesus sends to His people through individuals called by God to prophetic ministry (see 1:1–2).

Here, Revelation shows that the prophetic ministry will continue among God's people until the time of the end. What was true of God's people in all times will also be true at the end of time: God's people will be in possession of the prophetic gift. In the final crisis, when the whole world will turn away from God, Christ will provide special guidance to His people through the gift of prophecy, which will enable them to avoid being deceived.

19:11–21

The Conclusion of the Battle of Armageddon

At this point, the book turns to describe the conclusion of the battle of Armageddon. While the final battle has been spoken of two times in the book (16:12–16; 17:14–18), it is in 19:11–21 that the description of the actual battle is given.

19:11–16. The Coming of Christ as the Warrior-King. While John previously watched in vision the exaltation of Christ on the heavenly throne through the open gates of heaven in Revelation 4:1, he here saw the gates of heaven opened for Christ to come down to the earth to fight His final battle with the evil forces. Christ is portrayed as a Roman general riding on a white horse. He is called Faithful and True (see Rev. 3:14), which points to His faithfulness and His promise to provide deliverance for His people. He is about to wage the final war in justice and righteousness (v. 11). While wars are usually matters of military oppression and bloodshed, the war that Christ is about to wage will be for the purpose of establishing everlasting justice and His everlasting kingdom.

John once again saw Christ's eyes as fire (v. 12), just as he had seen them among the lampstands (see 1:14), which denotes His ability to judge. Nothing can remain hidden from His penetrating insight. On His head were many royal crowns, as the token of His absolute authority. He had a title inscribed that was known to nobody except Him. However, John later reveals that Christ's title is King of kings and Lord of lords (v. 16), inscribed on His robe and His thigh (see 17:14). In Revelation 5, Christ had been exalted, but His reign has been constantly challenged by Satan's claim to be the ruler of the earth. John saw Christ coming with all authority and power to abolish Satan's usurping rule and authority and to assume His rightful position as the only true King and Lord over the earth.

Christ's robe was dipped in blood (v. 13), a description that evokes Isaiah's portrayal of God returning from punishing Edom in a blood-stained robe (Is. 63:1–3). The fact that Christ's robe was stained with blood before the battle begins suggests that this was the blood of Christ's persecuted followers (see Rev. 17:6; 19:2). Christ was coming to avenge their blood and vindicate them. His identifying name in the final battle was the word of God. Verse 15 depicts a sharp sword proceeding from His mouth with which He was to strike down the nations (see v. 21). A sword is a symbol of the word of God (Eph. 6:17; cf. Is. 11:4). Paul prophesied that Christ would defeat the end-time apostate religious system with the breath of His mouth and destroy it with the splendorous appearance of His coming (2 Thess. 2:8). That the weapon of the final battle is symbolically pictured as coming out of Christ's mouth affirms what is evident elsewhere in the book: that the battle of Armageddon is not a military war but rather a spiritual battle fought to resolve the fundamental issue concerning the true ruler of the universe, the issue that started the Great Controversy.

Christ was accompanied by the armies of heaven, which were pictured riding on white horses and being dressed in "fine linen, white and clean" (v. 14). This army could be the army of angels that will accompany Him at the Second Coming (cf. Matt. 24:30–31; 2 Thess. 1:7). It has also been suggested that it could represent the end-time people of God. However, the angels and the end-time saints are not mutually exclusive concepts in the heavenly armies. The robes of the end-time saints signify their righteous deeds (see v. 8). Revelation 17:14 demonstrates that the end-time saints will be involved in Christ's final battle against the forces of evil. They are also described as being the kings from the east (lit., "the rising of the sun"; 16:12). While God's people are in actuality on the earth waiting for translation (1 Thess. 4:16–17), according to this interpretation, they already share in Christ's glory (Eph. 2:6). In any case, Revelation portrays God's people as joining Christ and the accompanying angels in His triumphant victory over their enemies.

19:17–21. Conclusion of the Battle of Armageddon. John saw an angel calling the scavengers of the sky in a loud voice, gathering them together for the supper of God (v. 17), where they would eat the flesh of the armies of the earth (see v. 21). This call to the birds of prey stands in contrast to the previous invitation to the wedding supper of the Lamb (19:9). This gruesome scene reflects Ezekiel's vision in which God's judgment on the pagan nations of Gog is portrayed as a sacrificial feast prepared for the birds of the air and the beasts of the field (Ezek. 39:17–21).

People of every sociopolitical level—including kings, commanders of one thousand troops (Gr. chiliarchoi), mighty leaders, mounted troops, freemen, slaves, and the small and the great—are all among those slain at the Second Coming. They are those who have sided with Babylon in opposition to God in the final battle. In the scene of the sixth seal, they are portrayed as trying to hide themselves from the face of God and of the Lamb (6:15–17). The link between the two texts shows that the destruction of the wicked will occur in the context of the Second Coming.

The satanic triumvirate will send their envoys to entice the governing powers of the world to engage in the final war against God's end-time people (16:13–14). A worldwide religious and political confederacy will thus be formed under the auspices of the satanic trinity. They will assemble for the great battle at Armageddon (16:16) to wage war with the Lamb, but He will defeat the religious-political confederacy (17:14; see also Dan. 12:1) when He comes in glory and power. Revelation 6:15–17 depicts the kings and mighty men as not fighting but running in panic, trying to hide themselves from the Lamb's wrath. Two members of the satanic triumvirate, the beast and the false prophet, will be captured and thrown alive into the burning lake (v. 20), which here refers to the event in which the earth is destroyed by fire in the full and ultimate end of all rebellion against God (see 20:14).

The rest of the people will be killed by the sword that proceeds from Christ's mouth. As Paul explains, they will be destroyed by the glory of Christ's power (2 Thess. 1:8–10). The whole earth will resemble an ancient battlefield, covered with the bodies of the slain, whose flesh will be eaten by the birds (v. 21). The defeat of the worldwide confederacy of rebellious humanity that gathered against God and His people in the final combat will be total and complete.

The Millennium

The battle of Armageddon will conclude with the total destruction of the confederacy of evil forces. Satan's two allies will be thrown into the lake of fire, and those who have supported Babylon will be slain, awaiting the final judgment. The only person left will be Satan. Revelation 20 describes the setting during the Millennium along with the fate of Satan and his followers at the final judgment.

20:1–3. The Binding of Satan. John observed an angel coming down from heaven with a key to the abyss or bottomless pit and a large chain in his hands. He seized the dragon, who is identified as the ancient serpent, the devil, and Satan (see 12:9), and bound him for one thousand years using a symbolic chain (20:2). This chaining will occur at the Second Coming. John observed as the angel threw Satan into the abyss (see 9:1) and securely imprisoned him (20:3). In the NT, the bottomless pit is the place where Satan and his demonic forces will be confined until they receive their rightful judgment (Luke 8:31; 2 Pet. 2:4). In Revelation 20, the bottomless pit denotes the chaotic state of the earth that will be caused by the seven last plagues. Such a chaotic state brings to mind the emptiness of the earth before the Creation week (Gen. 1:2) and the condition of the land of Israel during the Exile (Jer. 4:23–26).

The desolate earth will serve as Satan's prison. He will be prevented from deceiving the nations until after the Millennium (v. 3) by the simple fact that they will all be dead during this period. The one thousand years, known as the Millennium, will begin with the Second Coming of Christ. It has been suggested that it will be a literal one thousand years because after the Second Coming, time periods may no longer be symbolic. In any case, the passage seems to point to the Millennium as a real period of time that concerns Satan and the fallen angels on one side and God's resurrected people on the other.

Satan will be bound with the fallen angels by a chain of circumstances. With the death of the wicked and the transference of the living and resurrected saints to heaven (1 Thess. 4:16–17), there will be none left to deceive or harm. All that Satan and his demonic forces will be able to do is contemplate the consequences of their rebellion against God. Satan, at the end of the Millennium, will be released from his imprisonment to once again perform his deceitful activities (20:3, 7–10).

20:4–6. The Saints in Heaven. With Satan and his fallen angels confined to the earth, the vision turns to the glorified saints who are pictured sitting on thrones. Although the text does not explicitly state where they are during the Millennium, it implies that they will spend the Millennium in heaven (7:9–17; 19:1–10). Revelation says that they will be given authority to judge (v. 4), echoing Jesus's promise to His disciples that they would "sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19:28). Furthermore, Paul foretold that the saints were to judge the world and even angels (1 Cor. 6:2–3). The saints' exercise of judgment during the Millennium is related to questions concerning the fairness of God's actions in the universe. Throughout history, Satan has cast many doubts concerning God's character and His dealings with the beings He created. During the Millennium, God will allow the redeemed saints to access the records of the events of history in order to find answers to all questions related to His leading in their own lives on earth—questions concerning the fairness of His decisions regarding those who were lost.

Two groups in particular are mentioned in the prophecy, the first of which is made up of the ones who had been beheaded for their testimonies about Jesus and their fidelity to the word of God (cf. Rev. 1:2). This is a reference to the martyrs in the scene of the fifth seal (Rev. 6:9–11). The second group consists of the end-time saints, who had not worshiped the beast or his image and had not received his mark on their foreheads or their hands. These saints had all come to life and been taken to heaven to participate in Christ's millennial kingdom. This vision presents the fulfillment of Christ's promise that the overcomers in Laodicea would share His throne (3:21). God's people, who have suffered hardships on the earth due to their faithfulness to the gospel, will be exalted to the glorious status of sharing Christ's throne.

The raising of the saints to life will be "the first resurrection" (v. 5), which will include all believers and take place at the beginning of the Millennium. The sinful rest of humanity will be resurrected at the conclusion of the Millennium, which coincides with Satan's release from his solitary confinement. John describes those raised in the first resurrection as "blessed and holy" (v. 6), not subject to "the second death" (see Rev. 2:11) that is the fate of the wicked in the lake of fire (20:14–15; 21:8). The prophet declares that the redeemed saints will be "priests of God and of Christ" during the Millennium (v. 6). As such, they will be in the immediate presence of God and will have access to the records of God's governance over the universe. At the conclusion of the Millennium, all questions involving God's justice will be forever settled. God's people will be able to see beyond a shadow of doubt the greatness of God's love and care manifested in His Son and in their own lives on earth. They will then be ready to witness the administration of God's justice at the final judgment.

20:7–10. Release of Satan. At the conclusion of the Millennium, Satan will be released from his prison in the bottomless pit at the same time that the wicked dead are resurrected at the second resurrection. If the prophetic chaining of Satan was caused by the absence of people on earth, his release will be caused by the resurrection of the wicked. Through his deceitful activities, he will gather together the wicked of all ages against God's people, who will be encamped in the beloved city. The assembled wicked are portrayed in terms of "Gog and Magog" (v. 8), the enemies that were assembled against Israel in the Holy Land and that were to be utterly destroyed by God (Ezek. 38:22–23; 39:6). John referred to this OT history to describe both Satan's final attack on the saints at the end of the Millennium and God's miraculous intervention to protect them.

The wicked will surround new Jerusalem under Satan's leadership, ready to attack and destroy God's people (v. 9). Although the descent of the new Jerusalem is not mentioned until Revelation 21:2, it is evident that the city with the saints inside will have descended prior to the time of Satan's attack. This last attack on the Holy City will demonstrate the hardness of the hearts of those who rejected God. Their rebellious hearts will be filled with the same hatred against God and His people that they demonstrated before the Second Coming and Millennium. This hatred will once again affirm that they have been rightly judged.

However, the attack will not take place, because God will intervene to protect the righteous within the city. Fire will come down from heaven and will devour the wicked (v. 9), and Satan and his fallen angels will meet their end in the lake of fire (v. 10), thus sharing the fate of the two other members of the diabolic triumvirate. The text states that they will be "tormented day and night" forever (v. 10; see also 14:10–11). As we saw earlier, the phrase "forever and ever" denotes a continuation of an action until it completes God's purpose (see commentary on Rev.

14:9–11). Satan's punishment will be irreversible, and all of his followers will share in it.

20:11–15. The Final Judgment. Having succinctly recounted the fate of Satan and his hordes, John next presents a more detailed description of how the destruction of the wicked will take place. He saw that as Satan and his hordes surround the city and are about to carry out their attack, a great white throne, on which God sits, will suddenly appear (v. 11). In response, the universe will convulse in cataclysmic terror. At this moment, every person who has ever lived on the earth but has spurned God's mercy will be brought to judgment before the throne of God. People from all ages and every socioeconomic class will be there. No one will be exempt; all will be required to give an account of the wrongs they have committed.

The books of record will be opened (v. 12). These are the records of human deeds that show whether a person has been loyal to God. Then, the Book of Life will be opened, which contains the names of all those who belong to God (Phil. 4:3). The rebellious will be judged according to the record of what they have done (v. 13; cf. Rom. 2:6). John saw that anyone whose name was not found in the Book of Life was thrown into the lake of fire (v. 15). The lake of fire is not an everlasting burning hell but rather a metaphorical description of the whole earth burning with fire (see Rev. 20:9). It is the place of complete destruction (Matt. 10:28), "the second death" (Rev. 20:14), where all who have rebelled against God will meet their ultimate end. The fire will burn long enough to consume everything completely. Its flames will destroy everything, not leaving even a root or a branch (Mal. 4:1), which symbolically represent "Satan the root, [and] his followers the branches" (GC 657).

The second death also means the end of death, since Death and Hades will also be thrown into the lake of fire. As Paul stated, the last enemy to be destroyed is death (1 Cor. 15:26). Eternal life for the redeemed can begin only when this great enemy is terminated. At that point, an eternity without sin and sinners will begin.

21:1—22:5

GOD'S ETERNAL KINGDOM

Revelation 21–22 brings us to John's last vision, which includes the conclusion of the cosmic controversy with the triumph of God over the forces of evil. Purged of all traces of sin, this earth with its capital, the new Jerusalem, will become the eternal home of the redeemed.

21:1–8

The Restored Earth

The description of the new world is given in the language of Genesis 1–3. God will restore the new earth, along with the Garden of Eden, which was lost because of sin. God's original plan for humanity will thus finally be realized.

21:1. The New Earth. The eradication of sin will bring about a new heaven and a new earth to replace the former heaven and earth. There are three heavens in Jewish tradition: the sky, the starry universe, and the dwelling place of God (cf. 2 Cor. 12:2). Revelation 21:1 obviously refers to the earth's atmosphere, the sky. In Revelation 20:11, the old earth and sky could not endure God's presence, which points to the total transformation that this planet will undergo. The Greek word kainos ("new") denotes something new in form and quality rather than new in origin and time. The new earth will be the renewed earth, purged by fire and restored to its original state (2 Pet. 3:10–13).

One thing in particular that caught John's attention was that the sea no longer existed. Perhaps this means that the oceans we know today will cease to exist; however, the phrase may be understood as a metaphor for the absence of the evil that stands in opposition to God. In the vision of 13:1, the sea was the place out of which the enemy of God came. With the removal of the symbolic sea, the evil that caused fear and suffering will be removed. The fact that John referred to the absence of the sea, which is the definite article used in the Greek, shows that he had a particular sea in mind. The sea by which he was surrounded on Patmos could have become for him a symbol of separation and suffering.

21:2–8. Life on the New Earth. God's presence among His people guarantees a life free of pain and death on the restored earth. This presence will be realized when the holy city, the new Jerusalem, descends from heaven, from God, at the end of the Millennium (Rev. 20:7–9). The fact that it is designated as "new" and that it will come from heaven shows that the city is not a rebuilt Jerusalem in the Holy Land but rather a heavenly city designed and constructed by God Himself (Heb. 11:10).

The new Jerusalem is referred to as God's dwelling place, His tabernacle, with His people (v. 3). He will live in the direct presence of the peoples (the Gr. of v. 3 is plural), all of whom are His own. In the city, there will be no temple, because the literal presence of God will be the city's temple (Rev. 21:22). In OT times, the sanctuary and the temple symbolized God's presence among His people (Ex. 29:44–45; Lev. 26:11–12; 2 Chr. 6:18–21). Because of Israel's unfaithfulness, God removed His presence from them (Matt. 23:37–38). However, He promised that He would once again make His dwelling place with His people and would be their God and they His people (Ezek. 37:27). The new Jerusalem will not need a symbol of God's presence, because God's presence will be literal and real in the city.

God's abiding presence means freedom from the suffering we know today—no more tears, death, sorrow, crying, or pain (v. 4; see Rev. 7:15–17). All of these are the consequences of sin. When sin no longer exists, the previous order of things will have expired. Isaiah prophesied that God "will swallow up death forever" and that He will "wipe away" the tears from all of our faces (Is. 25:8). Revelation describes the fulfillment of this prophecy, the realization of a glorious hope.

God then proclaimed that He was making everything new (v. 5), and John was told to write down these true and trustworthy words (see also Rev. 22:6). They are as faithful and true as God is faithful and true. A promise is as strong as the person giving it and his or her ability to do what he or she says. The promise of a life free from sin and suffering comes from God, "the Alpha and the Omega, the Beginning and the End" (v. 6), a proclamation that begins and ends the book (1:8; 22:13). God the Creator is the One who will restore this world to its original state.

This section concludes with a promise and a warning. Those who overcome are promised the status of being children of God with all the rights of natural heirs. They will inherit all the things promised in the conclusions of the messages to the seven churches in Revelation 2–3. However, those who spurn God's mercy in all their various rebellions (see the list in v. 8) will be excluded from the heavenly city (see 21:27; 22:15). Their lot will be the second death in the lake of fire prepared for Satan and his angels (Matt. 25:41).

The New Jerusalem

John next described the capital of the new earth: the new Jerusalem. While it will be a real place inhabited by real people, the city and life therein are beyond our comprehension, surpassing our imaginations (1 Cor. 2:9). It is therefore portrayed in symbolic language in terms of the fortified cities of the time, the OT temple, the restored temple from Ezekiel 40–48, and the restored Garden of Eden (Gen. 2–3). John first describes the city's exterior (21:9–21a) before moving inside the city (21:21b—22:5).

21:9–21a. The Exterior of the City. John was invited to observe the new Jerusalem (see Rev. 21:2). In the OT, the earthly Jerusalem is often spoken of as a bride lavishly adorned by and for God, her groom (Is. 49:14–18; 62:1–5). In Revelation 19:7–8, the same metaphor is applied to God's people, who are synonymous with the new Jerusalem. The new Jerusalem is depicted as situated on a great and high mountain (v. 10). The purpose of this imagery is to affirm God's ultimate triumph over the end-time apostate system.

The city will radiate the glory of God, which appeared to John as a jasper stone, clear as crystal (v. 11). In the OT temple, God's glory denoted His presence (Ex. 40:34–35; Ezek. 43:1–5). John saw the new Jerusalem surrounded by a high wall with twelve gates—three on each of the four sides, with angels by all of them (vv. 12–13). The city walls were made of jasper and transparent gold (v. 18), accentuating the splendid glory of the city. The gates on each side allowed entry from any direction, which points to the universal scope of the city. Jesus foretold that many would come from all directions to sit at the table in God's kingdom (Luke 13:29). In the new Jerusalem, everyone will have unlimited access to God's presence.

John saw that the gates of the new Jerusalem were made of huge pearls inscribed with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel (vv. 12, 21), similar to the gates in Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. 48:30–35). The twelve tribes of Israel represent God's people of the OT. The new city will have twelve foundations that have the names of the twelve apostles on them (v. 14). The twelve apostles represent God's people of the NT (Eph. 2:20). The coupling of the twelve tribes and the twelve apostles shows the continuity of God's people and identifies the city as the place for all of His people, regardless of the time period in which they lived. The foundations of the city were decorated with all kinds of precious stones (v. 19), which correlate with the precious stones that decorated the breastplate of the high priest in the OT and that were engraved with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel (Ex. 28:17–21).

The new Jerusalem in John's vision was twelve thousand furlongs or stadia (about 1,400 mi. or 2,250 km) in length, width, and height, making it a perfect cube. A cube consists of twelve edges, and since each edge is 12,000 stadia long, the entire city totaled 144,000 stadia. This figure—144,000—is the number of the totality of God's people (see Rev. 7:4). In Solomon's temple, the holy of holies was a perfect cube as well (1 Kin. 6:20). It housed the ark of the covenant, which represented God's throne. Thus, the city will function not only as the temple but also as the holy of holies, having the throne of God and of the Lamb inside (Rev. 22:3). In the earthly temple, only the high priest was allowed to enter the holy of holies to meet with God. In the new Jerusalem, this privilege will be granted to all the redeemed (vv. 3–4).

21:21b–27. Inside the City. Inside the city, John saw a street of gold so pure it resembled transparent glass. The city did not need the light of the sun or the moon, for the glory of God provided light for its residents (v. 23; see also 22:5). There will thus be no night in the city (v. 25), which is a fulfillment of another of Isaiah's prophecies (60:19–20). The nations will walk in the light of the city and the kings of the earth will bring their brilliance and majesty into it (Rev. 21:24; cf. Is. 60:3). John identified the redeemed as the nations and kings of the restored earth (see Rev. 1:6; 5:9–10). The city gates will never be closed, similar to what Isaiah foresaw (60:11). The open gates will make it possible for all people to come into the presence of God at any time.

The only condition for entering the new Jerusalem is to have one's name registered in the Lamb's Book of Life (v. 27). The unclean ones who practice abominations and lies will be excluded from the city (see 22:15). These will be the ones who have drunk from Babylon's cup of abominations and unclean things (17:4) and who will meet their ultimate end in the lake of fire (20:15; 21:8).

22:1–5. On the Banks of the River of Life. The new Jerusalem is further depicted as the restored Garden of Eden. John observed a river of life-giving water flowing from the throne of God and the Lamb (cf. Gen. 2:10). The prophets of the OT often spoke of a river of living water flowing from the restored temple in Jerusalem and giving life to all (Ezek. 47:1–12; Joel 3:18; Zech. 14:8). The river of the water of life in the new Jerusalem stands in contrast to the waters of the Euphrates on which end-time Babylon was dwelling (Rev. 17:1). God's people sat as captives at the river in ancient Babylon, longing for Jerusalem (Ps. 137). With the destruction of Babylon, the captivity of God's people will be over. It is on the banks of the river of life in the new Jerusalem that God's wandering people will finally find their home and will rest at last.

The tree of life grows on the banks of the river (v. 2), yielding fruit every month. The tree of life (first referenced in Gen. 2:9) symbolizes eternal life (Gen. 3:22). Because of sin, human beings lost access to the tree of life and became subject to death (vv. 22–24). In the new Jerusalem, the curse of sin will be removed and the redeemed will once again have access to the tree of life, sharing in the gift of eternal life that Adam enjoyed prior to the entrance of sin.

The leaves of the tree of life will be "for the healing of the nations" (v. 2; see Ezek. 47:12). This does not mean, however, that the leaves will have the power to heal sickness and disease, for there will be no sickness or death in the restored earth after the eradication of sin (Rev. 21:4). The text identifies the leaves of the tree as being for the healing of nations (Gr. ethnoi), not of individuals. People of all nations, tribes, and languages or tongues (7:9) will inhabit the new Jerusalem. As the redeemed gather under the leaves of the tree and eat its fruit, all the wounds caused by the barriers that have divided and torn people apart for ages—national, tribal, racial, and linguistic—will be gone. As the prophet Micah prophesied, nations will no longer raise swords against one another or train for war (Mic. 4:3–4). The redeemed of the restored earth will belong to the one great family of God.

In the new Jerusalem, there will be no sin (v. 3). Because of the curse that sin brought on the world, human beings were banished from the Garden of Eden. With the eradication of sin, God's people will be brought back to the restored Eden. The greatest of all the privileges they will enjoy in the new Jerusalem will be seeing God's face. The perennial desire of human beings throughout history has been to see God's face, something that even Moses was denied (Ex. 33:18–20). This wish will be realized in the new Jerusalem; they will serve and worship Him in His temple (see Rev. 7:15). His name will be on their foreheads (v. 4) as the reward for refusing the mark of the beast (15:2). The conclusion of the Great Controversy will mark the beginning of a full, intimate fellowship with God. The righteous of the city will reign forever (v. 5).

Revelation portrays the new Jerusalem as the fulfillment of human longings, hopes, and dreams. God's people have lived and died hoping for the coming of that wonderful city (Heb. 11:10, 16). As such, it stands in contrast to the harlot city Babylon, which represents futile ambitions for power and prosperity based on human strategies and efforts. However, the final word will be with God. Babylon will come to its end, and the new Jerusalem will rise in its place.

EPILOGUE

In concluding the book, John reaffirmed the things he declared in the introduction (22:6–17) and issued a final warning in his closing remarks (22:18–21).

22:6–7

Authentication of the Book

The concluding section of Revelation begins with another affirmation that all John had heard and seen was trustworthy and true (cf. Rev. 21:5). The significance of this is rooted in the fact that Christ is the One who is faithful and true (3:14; 19:11); He is the One who gave the prophecies of Revelation to John in order to reveal to His people the things that were soon to transpire (cf. 1:1). The prophecies of Revelation and the hope embedded in them are thus as reliable as Christ Himself is reliable; they will all surely come true.

22:7–17

Affirmation of the Second Coming

Jesus reminded His people that He is coming soon three times in this concluding section (22:7, 12, 20). The return of Christ is the keynote of the book (see 1:7). In referring to His coming, Jesus used the futuristic present tense: He is coming soon. Although a literal future event, Jesus referred to His coming as if it were already taking place—as if He had already begun to come. God's people must therefore take seriously the prophecies of Revelation in order to be ready to meet Christ when He arrives in power and glory.

Once again, overwhelmed by what he had just seen and heard, John prostrated himself to worship the angel who spoke with him. However, just as in Revelation 19:10, the angel warned him not to do so, since God alone is to be worshiped. The angel spoke of being only a servant in service to John, his fellow prophets, and all those who heed the words of the prophecy recorded in the book of Revelation. The angel instructed John not to seal the prophecies of Revelation in stark contrast to the command to Daniel to seal the end-time prophecies of his respective book (Dan. 12:4, 9). The prophecies of Daniel concerned events to take place in the distant future, and as such, they were not relevant to the people of Daniel's time. However, the prophecies of Revelation were not to be kept sealed because the time was soon to arrive (v. 10). They have to be repeatedly and consistently read and studied by God's people as the history of this world nears its end (Rev. 1:3).

At this point, a declaration is made in connection with the nearness of Christ's coming: let the evil and vile persist in their evil and vileness and the righteous and holy continue in their righteousness and holiness (v. 11). This correlates with the events we see connected to the unsealing of Daniel's end-time prophecies: there will be a separation between those who heed those prophecies and those who reject them (Dan. 12:10). Revelation 22:10–11 shows that people can choose to accept or reject the prophetic message. However, the time is coming when it will be too late to change; the door of opportunity to turn to God will close, and grace will no longer be available. Christ is coming to reward each person according to his or her choices and actions (v. 12).

The book once again reminds us of the condition the righteous must meet before entering into eternal life, calling those who keep God's commandments or wash their robes "blessed" (v. 14). Whatever interpretation is in view here, the righteous deeds of God's people are the result of Christ's work in their lives. It is because of what He has done for them and in them that they will stand in the presence of God in the new Jerusalem. On the other hand, the unfaithful and unholy, called dogs (Matt. 7:6)—practitioners of magic and sorcery, the sexually immoral, murderers, idolaters, and whoever loves and practices falsehoods—will be excluded from the city (v. 15).

Once again, Jesus affirms that He is the real Author of the book; He sent His angel to give John this message to the churches. He is the Root and Offspring of David, the bright Morning Star (v. 16). With this statement, Jesus has put His signature on the book. The prophecies of Revelation have come from Him. They were written for the churches, both of John's day and throughout history. Through these prophecies, Christ has unveiled the future of the church until the end of earth's history.

In response to Jesus's declaration that He is coming soon, the Holy Spirit makes a call through the bride, the church: "Come!" (v. 17). Those who respond must call others to come as well. Whoever is thirsty may come and drink the water of life, a free gift from God (see 21:6). The water of which Christ spoke is the message of Revelation. It is not enough to simply read the book of Revelation; we must "drink" its words, study its messages, and treasure them in our minds and hearts (see 1:3).

Final Warning and Appeal

At this point, Jesus gave a warning against adding to or removing from the words of the prophecy of the book. This warning echoes the exhortation of Moses to Israel at the end of their wilderness journey (Deut. 4:2; 12:32). Tampering with the prophecies of Revelation carries far-reaching consequences: whoever adds to the words of this prophetic book will have the plagues that it describes cast on them by God's punishment, and those who subtract from Revelation will be deprived of eternal life in the new Jerusalem (Rev. 22:18–19).

We must keep in mind that this warning is not simply about tampering with the actual words of Revelation; it also includes distorting and intentionally misinterpreting the prophecies of the book to suit one's own purposes or enforcing speculative ideas and views unsupported by the text. We must keep in mind that we are dealing with unfulfilled prophecies, the understanding of which will come after they have been fulfilled (John 14:29). We must stay with what is clearly stated in the text and not speculate beyond what the prophecy has revealed to us.

In addition, one may take away from the words of Revelation by deliberately undermining their divine origin and their prophetic character because the message of the book is unpopular or not widely accepted. Such a person is as guilty of tampering with the prophecies of the book as the one who adds to it. Both will suffer eternal loss.

For the last time, Christ reminds the readers of Revelation of His speedy coming (v. 20). On behalf of all of us, John responded with an affirming exclamation: Amen! Come, Lord Jesus!

The book closes with a benediction: may the grace of Jesus Christ be with us all (v. 21). This phrase is much more than just a customary benediction. Its purpose is to assure God's people that their only hope is in the grace of Christ. His grace will equip His people to go through the tumultuous times of the final crisis, and it is through His grace that the promises of Revelation will be realized when He returns to claim His faithful people as His bride and take them to their eternal home. This hope nurtures, comforts, and strengthens us as we wait for its fulfillment.

The biblical canon closes with an announcement of the complete realization of the Christian hope, given to humans in the Garden of Eden through the promise of salvation (Gen. 3:15). Many of those who embraced that promise died holding on to it. Revelation tells us that this is a living hope as it is embodied in Christ and that we will enjoy it at the moment of His glorious return.

Yes, come, Lord Jesus, come!
